Do not forget July 4, 1898, when we celebrated the great victory of the day before. Your father will tell you how the Spanish squadron, under the command of Admiral Cervera, was destroyed by our American sailor boys on July 3, twelve years ago. That year, like this year, July 3 and 4 were on Sunday and Monday. I have a beautiful story for you concerning a Christlike act on that Sunday of July 3, 1898, a story that was told to the world on July 4, 1898. The story was told by an eye-witness and recently retold in the Youth's Companion.

THE late Admiral Sampson told the story to an audience of small boys in the parlor of a social settlement house. They were ragged boys of more than one nationality, but they proudly called themselves Americans, and they had come to see and hear an American hero.

The admiral judged his audience correctly at once. He saw that they were at the impatient age, and plunged straight into his story. "I want to tell you of something that happened on my ship the morning the American fleet took the harbor of Santiago," he said, and all the wrigglers stopped wriggling.

"You all remember that battle?" Vigorous noddings from every head. "And you know my ship was late getting there?" More nods. "All round us, as we sailed in, there were signs of a Spanish defeat, wreckage, dead men, disaster. What day of the week was that?"

"Sunday!" shouted the audience as one boy.

"YES, Sunday morning; and we always have prayers on the Admiral's ship Sunday morning. The little reading desk, or pulpit, with the cross carved on the top of it, was still standing on deck. We had gone into battle so hastily that no one had time to put the desk away. It was a little thing, easily moved about. So we sailed along, and there was death and destruction on the face of the waters. And the battle was won. But among the dead things and the burning things that floated on the water we saw a man swimming. He was a Spanish sailor, one of our enemies. He was making a struggle for his life, but there was nothing near enough for him to cling to, and each stroke he made was fainter than the last. The shore was a long way off. According to the rules of war, we had no time to save his life; besides, he was our enemy."

The room was very still; every eye was fixed on the Admiral.

"Some of us on that side of the ship," he continued, "watched the man curiously, wondering how long he would hold out. Then all of a sudden one of our sailors picked up that little pulpit and pitched it over the side of the ship into the sea. 'Here, friend,' he cried, 'cling to that! Cling to the cross, and it'll take you safe to shore!'

"OF course the Spaniard couldn't understand those English words. but the action was unmistakable; and the last we saw of the poor fellow he was clinging to the pulpit with its cross moving toward the shore. That's the kind of American you want to be, boys—the kind that sailor was aboard my ship."

Then they all stood up in the settlement parlor and sang "America" till the ceiling trembled.

THE Children's Pulpit has on it the cross and from it we want the Juniors to learn on Sunday, July 3, to celebrate on Monday, July 4. Have you any offering to make to your country? How are you going to celebrate? How would it do to get all your playmates together and elect one to read aloud the Declaration of Independence? Then tell the Admiral Sampson story. And then ask how many would be willing to try to save an enemy? And then and there find out how many are willing to use the Children's Pulpit to help save some boy or girl who through sin is drifting to death? What next? All resolve to be good Christians and good citizens. Then one and all sing "America," and close with three cheers for the Fourth.

The Busy Bowery Mission

By Superintendent John G. Hallimond

NOTWITHSTANDING the great loss sustained by the Bowery Mission in the death of Dr. Klopsch, the work has been prosecuted with unabated zeal, and, thanks to the splendid appointments of the new premises, with greater effectiveness than ever.

Many CHRISTIAN HERALD readers have, since its opening, visited the new mission at 227 Bowery, and have seen for themselves the handsome, spacious, and serviceable plant, placed at the disposal of the workers by the wisdom and foresight of the late lamented president. They have also witnessed the remarkable scenes of religious earnestness and fervor that take place at the nightly meetings of the Mission.

The "Brotherhood," which is composed of newly converted men, and which meets every evening at seven o'clock in the Brotherhood room, march to their reserved seats in the front of the auditorium just as the meeting is about to commence. Sometimes they enter to the accompaniment of a processional hymn like "Onward, Christian Soldiers," and their hour's exercise of prayer and song in the "upper room" generally sends them to their places full of fire and eagerness for the evening service.

There is never a meeting held without precious souls being gathered into the kingdom. During the last few months, some remarkable cases of conversion have taken place.

The preaching at the evening meetings is such as probably no other religious institution in the world is blessed with. Ministers from all the evangelical denominations within a fifty-mile radius of the city gladly give their services and very often bring helpers with them. On a recent evening, Dr. Wallace MacMullen, of the Madison Avenue M. E. Church, brought with him the organist and the splendid choir of singers for which that church is so well renowned. Chaplain Knox, of Columbia University, was accompanied by a choir of forty students, who gave the Bowery men a rare musical treat. Many of the Young People's Societies have also visited the Mission, and taken part in the proceedings, so that the work at the evening meetings is in a state of perpetual "revival."

The Free Labor Bureau is continually at work during the summer months, getting men out of the crowded city, into country places. During the last twenty-eight months, eight thousand and forty-two positions have been found for men, by far the greater portion of them being permanent positions at a living wage.

The Medical Department, under Dr. Charles Forbes of Columbia University, has been a great success. Several men have been treated for physical diseases of various kinds, and have received at the hands of Dr. Forbes not only careful and skilful medical attention, but the soundest and most loving kind of spiritual help.

During the coming months, the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be told of many of the most interesting incidents that are occurring in connection with the Bowery Mission, and to those who can make it possible to come and see the work personally an affectionate invitation is given to visit this busy corner of God's harvest field.

NOTICE!

General View of Our Children's Home at Mont-Lawn, Founded by Dr. Klopsch, Showing the Beautiful Chapel and Two of the Dormito

Mont-Lawn's Gates Are Wide Ope

Little Waifs on the Street

JUNE 25 witnessed the beginning of the sixteenth summer of our beautiful Children's Home at Mont-Lawn, Nyack-on-the-Hudson. For weeks past, workers have been preparing for the coming of the children, so that when the first detachment of wee lads and lasses of the tenements arrived, they would find the "Children's Paradise" as attractive as ever.

Dr. Klopsch's spirit and influence will continue to dominate at Mont-Lawn, although our little guests will sadly miss his smiling face and his cheerful voice. They will miss him in the chapel service, in their playtime on the big lawn and in Fort Plenty, the great open-air dining room, where he used to stand by and watch them with enjoyment as they ate with keen appetites the wholesome food set before them.

Friends who have been with Dr. Klopsch in the work ever since its beginning will continue it just as it was while he lived and directed it in person. The Children's Home has its own Board of Trustees and as its president, Dr. Klopsch's co-worker, Mr. G. H. Sandison, managing editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who was one of the original founders and incorporators and who has been associated with Dr. Klopsch in the management of the Home for sixteen years, ever since the day it opened. With him on the Board of Trustees is Mr. J. A. Belford, of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who has also been in the Mont-Lawn work for many years, and several others. All were co-workers with Dr. Klopsch and under their direction the Home will continue to be conducted in all respects as in the past. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S paternal relation to this benevolence will continue. This explanation is due to our readers.

There is probably no other benevolence of the kind that has so firm a hold upon the hearts of the people as Mont-Lawn. Their letters endorsing their loving gifts in aid of the work attest this. We quote from a few:

"May God open the hearts of many of his followers to help along the good work," writes "One Who Loves the Children," Brooklyn, N. Y. ($1.) "Enclosed find my annual subscription to the work at Mont-Lawn" ($21), writes Mrs. G. S. D., Montclair, N. J. "I had the pleasure last summer of seeing one of the parties of children start from the Bible House under the care of Dr. Klopsch and I am very glad to have had a glimpse of that good and noble man before he was called home. His work has been an inspiration to me." "Our daughter L—— was always interested in the Home," writes Mrs. H. H. R., Napierville, Ill. ($3). "She has been taken to her heavenly home, and I know she would be pleased to have me send this contribution." Miss C. B., of Queen City, Mo., writes: "Enclosed find draft for $21 to endow a cot for the season in memory of J. C. and J. S. Brenizer. They were deeply interested in the work and showed their interest in help while living. Now after their last roll-call has been answered this is sent in memory of them and their work by their daughter." "I wish this might be ten times as much," writes Mrs. S. B., Jennings, La. ($1). "My prayers are that God's blessings may rest upon the dear little children." Mrs. R. B. R., Hamlet, Neb. ($3), says: "May it make some dear child's life a little brighter." The Philathea Class, First Baptist Church, Tarrytown, N. Y., sends $21 through Miss Lawrence, treasurer, to endow a cot for the season. "The work for the children there," says the writer, "seems so nearly ideal." The Junior C. E. Society, Presbyterian Church, Poughkeepsie, sends $2 for the Fresh Air Fund. "Last year," writes Mabel L. W., of Lansingburgh, N. Y., "I paid for keeping a cot for the season. This year, my father joins me in sending $21 to keep the cot in memory of Eugene Stanley Wallace. I hope the children who occupy it will have a very happy time and receive much benefit from the outing." E. C. G., Poughkeepsie, N. Y., sends $22.56 for the support of the "Daisy Cot" he has supported hitherto at Mont-Lawn, and adds: "I would like to have it in memory of Dr. Klopsch this year. I enclose the names of the friends who have contributed: Mrs. Hugh T. Lawrence, Mrs. Rowland Haynes, Charlotte Van Winkler, Dr. Cook, E. J. Gill, C. B. Gill, Mrs. Denee, and Mrs. E. C. Gill. . . . I feel that I have lost a personal friend in Dr. Klopsch, but God will still bless Mont-Lawn, I am sure." M. P. B., Brooklyn, N. Y. ($21), writes: "For the endowment of a little bed at Mont-La... Kindly accept the gift in His name who said 'St... little children to come unto me.' May God's b... ing rest on the little ones." Mrs. A. M. N. send... "to help make some child's life a little bright..." The Willing Workers' Society of Cestos, O... through Mrs. Nellie Evins, president, sends $3... the benefit of the tenement children. With this... also sends a gift of pretty garments, under... ments, ribbons and kerchief for the little folks. "I... hope this will give two dear little ones a happy ... at Mont-Lawn this summer," writes S. W. M., S... mit Bridge, Bermuda ($6). A Friend, Perry, O... ($6), writes: "This is for the outing of two l... girls who need it badly. I do hope they will enj... to the full, for I have had to sacrifice in order to... it. I wish it were three times as much." F... Mrs. R. M. P., Eddyville, Ia. ($50), comes ... beautiful wish: "I hope the Lord's blessing ... go with it in helping the little ones." Most to... ing of all is a note from a reader in Reading, M... which says: "I enclose a money order for $5 for ... Mont-Lawn Home. It belonged to my boy who ... drowned, so I give it for the benefit of the child ... I hope God will raise up some one to carry on ... work and spread abroad the love of a warm h... as Dr. Klopsch has done."

A large gathering of the friends of our Fresh-... work is expected at Mont-Lawn on the Fourth ... July. Independence Day is always a red-letter ... at our Children's Home and the coming Fourth ... be no exception. There will be the usual patri... exercises, including the raising and salu... of the flag, the children's drill on the ... lawn, the service in the beautiful Childr... Two Plucky Boys from Oklahoma

PARENTS and instructors often talk at educational conventions of the need of teaching the children self-reliance and to think and act for themselves, but it is doubtful if many of them would have the courage to send two boys, one of ten, the other of six years, on a journey of two thousand miles on pony back, where they had to depend on themselves to get safely through, over strange roads among strange people. This, however, was the case with the two plucky Abernathy boys who rode alone from Oklahoma to New York City, to take part in the parade to greet Colonel Roosevelt. Their father, a breezy Westerner, is a great admirer of the ex-president, and he came to New York by train. He went to meet his sons at Trenton, N. J. The two boys have attracted great attention in New York. They called on the Mayor and then saw all the sights of the metropolis and also had a day at Coney Island. Their pictures were familiar to the public, and crowds surrounded them wherever they went. A place was assigned them in the Roosevelt home-coming celebration.

Col. Roosevelt and Captain Kaiserin Augusta

COLONEL ROOSEVELT has had many "strenuous" days in his public career, to use his favorite word, but it is doubtful if any were more strenuous than the twenty-four hours following his return to America after a year and a quarter abroad. The welcome he received was enthusiastic and spontaneous beyond his own expectations and those of the committee which had arranged the plans for the river and land parade. The people themselves, of all classes, took the reception in hand and made it a success by sheer force of numbers. Thousands greeted him from steamer, tug and launch as he came up the bay, and hundreds of thousands shouted themselves hoarse as he made his triumphal progress to Fifty-ninth Street. One hundred thousand were massed in Battery Park.

It was just fifteen months ago that Colonel Roosevelt packed up his equipment and started for Africa to hunt lions. It may be said that there were more lions in Africa then than there are now. He got a good "send off," friends from many States gathering at the dock; but no one dreamed of such a welcome as was accorded the returning hunter and traveler and lecturer.

It was about 6.40 when the Kaiserin Augusta's hull showed up through the mist of the morning off Sandy Hook. The German liner was a mass of bunting from stem to stern in honor of the occasion. Crash went the first gun of the presidential salute from the side of the cruiser Charleston. As the ship steamed up the bay the Charleston and five torpedo boats followed as escort. Fort Wadsworth took up the noisy welcome and shook the hills of Staten Island with twenty-one thunderous salutes.

The revenue cutter Manhattan was alongside as the Kaiserin Augusta stopped at quarantine, and William Loeb, Colonel Roosevelt's former secretary, Senator Lodge, Congressman Longworth, and representatives of Governor Hughes and President Taft came over the side to welcome the Colonel. A few minutes later the trim Androscoggin, bearing the official committee, steamed alongside, a gangplank was swung across, and Cornelius Vanderbilt and Mayor Gaynor extended the official welcome. Colonel Roosevelt crossed to the Androscoggin, where a reception was held. The committee which met him on board was composed of distinguished governors, senators, leaders in both parties and men who fought side by side with Roosevelt in the war with Spain.

The old expression of "de-lighted!" did not drop from his lips so frequently as of yore. "Fine!" and "That's fine!" seemed to have taken its place as favorites in his speech. Meanwhile the water parade had started up the North River. Two revenue steamers led; then came the saucy gunboat Dolphin; next came the South Carolina, followed in turn by torpedo boats and patrol boats. The Androscoggin with the Colonel on the bridge came next, and close behind the Manhattan, bearing the Roosevelt family and intimate friends. Behind stretched an interminable line of yachts, tugs, and excursion boats, all with every stitch of bunting displayed, and tooting their whistles until coherent speech on the part of the passengers was out of the question.

The parade went up as far as Fourteenth Street by docks black with people, their voices coming out to the Colonel in one great confused roar. The line turned and went back to the Battery and there Colonel Roosevelt got a true idea of what the day was to be, and for a moment his emotion overcame him, and taking off his glasses he was seen to wipe them vigorously.

Through the tumult could be heard the band of the "Dandy Seventh" playing "Home, Sweet Home." At 10.36 he stepped on American soil once more and was hurried to the grandstand, where Mayor Gaynor in his welcome said that Colonel Roosevelt had been an exponent of American principles. Colonel Roosevelt in reply said he was made "proud and humble" by the greeting he had received. He had enjoyed himself, but was more than glad to get back home among the people he loved. Then he entered his carriage for the parade uptown. It was noticed that he had changed but little, except as his face was bronzed by the African sun. He seemed, if anything, stronger and more muscular than when he sailed away.

As a guard of honor there were over a hundred and forty Rough Riders. All were in the familiar khaki and rode as if horse and man were one. Broadway was a mass of flags, and banked with cheering people. The procession turned to the left at the beginning of Fifth Avenue to go up that famous thoroughfare.

On they went up Fifth Avenue, Mr. Roosevelt beaming with pleasure one moment at the cordiality of his reception and the next looking with amazement at the throngs of people packed in every side street, and filling the windows of the skyscrapers above his head.

At the Plaza at the lower end of Central Park, the parade ended. Jumping from the carriage the Colonel strode over to the Rough Riders drawn up before the Sherman statue. He shook hands with every one, called them by their first names, and expressed his appreciation of their coming.

Next he turned to greet the Spanish War veterans. They gave him a book of handsomely bound resolutions, and as he turned to his carriage the veterans cheered him as their "next commander-in-chief," and he responded with a wave of his hand.

"Roosevelt luck," which has become proverbial, was with the Colonel through the day. A blue sky was overhead and the storm held off until he was under cover, and the rain stopped again before he reached Oyster Bay.

The Right Use of National Power

THIS journal has been a consistent advocate of the principle that the influence of a powerful nation, to be rightly used, should be found on the side of peace and international helpfulness. The worst use to which any nation can put its citizens is to use them as food for powder; the most offensive way it can utilize its strength is in the oppression of its weaker neighbors. This policy, we are pleased to note, has found an able and practical exponent in our Secretary of State. In an address before the students of the University of Pennsylvania, Mr. Knox, speaking of the spirit and purpose of American diplomacy, used this very significant language:

> If this government can help to upbuild its neighbors and promote the thought that the capital of the more advanced nations of the world would be better employed in assisting the peaceful development of those more backward, than in financing wars, it is such a deviation from traditions as the American people will approve.

This is good Christian doctrine, and we believe it will meet the approval of all right-thinking Americans as a dignified and accurate statement of the national attitude. If it be a "deviation from tradition," then it is time we "trekked" as far away as possible from the policy that involves a nation in selfish aggressions and needless wars. But the Secretary went even further. American diplomacy had ushered in the modern era of arbitration. Twenty republics look to our example. "We have reached a point," he said, > where it is evident that the future holds in store a time when wars shall cease; when the nations of the world shall realize a federation as vital as that now subsisting between the component parts of a single State; when the strong shall universally help the weak; when the corporate righteousness of the world shall compel unrighteousness to disappear and shall destroy the habitations of cruelty still lingering in the dark places of the earth. . . That day will be the millennium, of course.

Truly, we are making progress, when the Secretary of State of this Republic openly proclaims such sentiments. Critics and political wiseacres may smile and say that the picture is visionary; but we accept the Secretary's presentment as a sign of the times, and a glimpse of that coming day for whose dawning every true man and woman sincerely hopes.

Mont-Lawn's Little Guests

IF any of our readers would wish to see what has been felicitously described as "a section of heaven let down to earth," we would invite them to visit our Children's Home at Mont-Lawn, which opens this week. This beautiful benevolence, which Dr. Louis Klopsch founded, and which he fostered with all the loving care of his sympathetic heart and skilful brain, is now in its sixteenth season. It has good friends all over the country who unite in declaring that among their many charities, there is none that gives so much pleasure and blessing as this, which deals with the little ones—"the least of these." Only the poorest children are taken, those who have no hope of getting a fresh-air outing from any other quarter. Already the applications are crowding in upon us thick and fast. There is no surer or better way of making your own summer pleasant and profitable, both spiritually and physically, than by providing a holiday for one of these little city waifs. Try it. No gift to this beautiful charity, however small, can come amiss at this season, when it may be the means of giving one poor little soul a few days' pure pleasure and of physically strengthening some weakling of the tenements and alleys.

"The Reproach of the Church"

THIS was the striking phrase employed by Mr. John R. Mott of New York, chairman of the Committee on Gospel Propagation, in addressing the International Missionary Conference in Edinburgh shortly after the opening session of that body. The Church, he proclaimed, needs energizing to carry on its great work of presenting the Gospel to all the non-Christian world. Its present opportunity is the greatest it has ever known; the field is more widely open and urgently waiting than at any previous time. If the Church neglects to grasp the opportunity, it will weaken its power and influence, and greatly impair the confidence of the coming generation. Its neglect of past opportunities constitutes "the reproach of the Church." Those who best understand the situation will hardly regard this criticism as overdrawn. In the first place, as Mr. Mott showed, the Church has been delinquent in the application of proper methods. In many mission fields there has been no unified movement, but a series of competitive efforts which resulted in waste of power. How different would have been the record, had the Christian forces been a solid, harmonious unit, instead of operating as rivals! Why should we ever give to the non-Christian races the impression of an army divided against itself? The need of the hour is an immediate increase of workers and a solid unity of action. No diversity of petty interests must be permitted to weaken the battle-front. Mr. Mott's plea for a unification of plans and forces is businesslike, timely and convincing and should be heeded. In no other way can we hope to win.

What Kind of a Celebration?

THERE is a strong movement in many of our cities to have what is called a "safe and sane" celebration of the Fourth of July, the idea being to reduce if not to eliminate altogether the large number of accidents which have marked the day in the last few years and have brought sorrow to the hearts of hundreds of parents. Every hospital at present prepares for the anniversary of the nation's natal day as if a battle were to be fought in the vicinity, and the doctors and nurses prepare a large store of antiseptic dressings, most of which are called into use. The reports of the maimed and killed fill pages in the newspapers and are the chief asset in the propaganda for some modification of present-day customs of celebrating.

It would seem, however, that a large number of the committees which are making commendable arrangements for a safe style of celebrating are also forgetting that they ever were young. In other words, they are preparing programmes for "grown-ups." Programmes largely literary will not appeal strongly to active boys and girls. The celebration of the Fourth, if it is intended for any one, is intended for the boys and girls; but if fireworks are to be used they should be set off by people who have arrived at an age of discretion. Why not return to the customs of a generation ago, where the parade was a great feature, not only a military parade of volunteer defenders of the nation, but also one in which floats of historic events of the "days which tried men's souls" are shown?

Athletic contests should be arranged, where the boys can show their prowess. The literary exercises should consist of the reading of the Declaration of Independence and an oration out of doors if possible, by some one who knows the history of the country and takes a just pride in the valor of the patriots of the colonies and does not deprecate patriotism of the same kind in 1910. There should be as many bands as the place can afford.

Let us be "safe and sane" by all means, but also let us make it a happy day for the youngsters.

His Missionary Substitutes

ON June 14, the following letter was received in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offices, Bible House, New York:

> Dear Editor: We desire to support two evangelists and one Bible-woman for one year, and would like to hear from and to correspond with them. I enclose envelope for receipt. I have marked the place on your list where the workers are located—Ongole, India. (Signed) W. H. G., Boston, Mass.

Accompanying the letter was a list of foreign mission stations at which missionaries of various Protestant denominations are now laboring, each of whom has urgent need of native workers as preachers, teachers, evangelists, Bible-women, matrons, and general helpers in the spiritual work. Considerably over one hundred native workers of the class named are now engaged in various foreign fields, being supported direct by readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

On the same day on which Mr. G.'s letter was received, containing $75, a check for that amount was forwarded to Rev. James M. Baker, Baptist Missionary, Ongole, Guntur District, South India, with instructions to apply the money to the support of two native evangelists and one native Bible-woman, the remittance being intended for their support for the coming year. Thus within twenty-four hours aft the receipt of the letter from our Boston reader, a the necessary steps had been taken by THE CHRI TIAN HERALD to meet the wishes of the patron, a the money was on its way which would put thr consecrated workers in the field fully commission as his substitutes in winning souls for Christ heathen India. They will be put in mail commun cation with their American patron and supporte This is the direct and simple method which is pu sued by this journal in dealing with its readers in matters relating to missionary work at home a abroad.

Prayer and the Prize-fight

GREENSBORO, GA

DEAR CHRISTIAN HERALD: Remember, we are counting the prayers of God's people to prevent that brutal and wick prize-fight that has been planned to take place in Californ the Fourth of July. M. ROBINSON

Christian people in every part of the Union ha been praying for weeks that the plans for disgra ing the State of California on the nation's holid might be frustrated. Their prayers have been wo derfully answered. Governor Gillett on June directed the Attorney-General of the State, Jud U. S. Webb, to take the necessary steps to stay t fight. Various statements are given by way explaining the Governor's action. One of these that the Governor feared that holding the brut contest in his State might defeat San Francisc hopes of getting the Panama Exposition in 191 Politicians and others may explain it as they wi but the incontrovertible fact remains that the gre national religious protest and the earnest praye of millions of God's people, that this shame mig be averted, have been signally answered. W shall say, too, that it is not a mighty and convinci answer to prayer, that could thus block the schem of the men who proposed to flood the country wi demoralizing moving picture shows which, becau of their number, would have been capable of doi a thousand-fold more damage than the fight itsel

Hamilton's Memorable Flight

ON the 13th day of June, Charles K. Hamilton, a small red-haired aeronaut, flew to Philadelphia and back, winning a prize of $10,000 ffered by the New York Times and the Philadelphia ublic Ledger. He left Governor's Island at 7.30 .M. and flew straight as an arrow and easily as a ird to Philadelphia, a distance of eighty-eight miles, eaching that city at 9.28. He bore a message from overnor Hughes to Governor Stuart and from layor Gaynor to Mayor Reyburn. Governor Stuart received the aviator, saying he felt very proud o welcome the first flying man. He began his reurn flight from Philadelphia at 11.30 A.M., and ew two-thirds of the distance to New York at a ecord speed, when his engine got out of gear and he as compelled to descend at South Amboy, N. J. le thought he was making his landing in a green ieadow, but it proved to be a swamp full of soft rass. The grass got tangled in his biplane, porons of which were broken, and the trip ould have been given up as a failure ad it not been for the man's wonderful ill and resourcefulness. He floundered rough the mud to the nearest telehone, and calling up Governor's Island e said to his wife, "I am O. K., but I m down here in a swamp near nowhere. ell Glenn Curtiss I want to talk to im." To Curtiss he said, "Glenn, I eed a propeller. Can you rush me a ew one over somehow?" At five o'clock urtiss and two friends reached the tranded man with a propeller, which as installed, and a crowd of neighbors ho had gathered lifted the flying maine up on their shoulders and carried some distance through the deep mud o a road from which the man ascended t 6.20 P.M., and nineteen minutes later e rested on the sands of Governor's sland. His outbound trip took an hour nd fifty-one minutes, his return trip n hour and thirty-six minutes of actual ying. He had made the hundred and eventy-two miles at an average of fty miles an hour. This flight of Hamton's was no chance feat of an adventurer, but was the result of almost a fetime of experience in aviation. It said that when he was eight years of ge he attempted flight from the roof of barn, using his mother's best parasol s a parachute. He then built a kite hich carried him a hundred feet in the ir, frightening his father and mother lmost to death. In 1906 he practised ith a carrying kite which Israel Ludw had made, undertaking forty ascenons from Riverside Drive over the ludson. During one of the trips he ell into the water and would have rowned had he not been such a good wimmer. In many of the States of the nion, in Mexico, and in Japan, he has een one of the most daring and successul aeronauts. His heroic mastery of he air was equaled by his wonderful luck and energy, which dragged victory out of the jaws of defeat in the ersey swamp. This memorable flight as attracted the attention and admiraon of the civilized world. It looks as hough the days of practical aviation ere just at hand. In 1773 it took a tage coach two days to go from New ork to Philadelphia; in 1840 the first ailway train made the trip in seven ours; the fastest train to-day between he cities takes two hours; Hamilton's me in his airship between the cities was one hour nd fifty-one minutes. The whole system of aviaon is man's imitation of God's wisdom as manisted in the flight of birds through the air.

Doth the hawk fly by thy wisdom, and stretch her wings toward he south? Doth the eagle mount up at thy command, and make er nest on high? (Job 39:26, 27.)

uvenile Dentistry

A singular benevolence was lately promised to he city of Boston. Thomas A. Forsyth, a wealthy esident, proposes to give $2,000,000 to care for the eeth of the children. He plans to give every child, rom the time of its first tooth until it shall arrive t the age of sixteen, the best dental service possible, ithout any charge. His purpose is to construct a uilding, equipped with every appliance known to odern dentistry and manned by a corps of dentists, ho will render the best professional service to be ound in the country. Care of children's teeth has much to do with their health and comfort, and such a foundation as Mr. Forsyth is asking the Legislature in his State to allow is a charity in completest harmony with the spirit of Christ, who loved the children and commanded his followers to care for them. All such ministry to the little ones is a like service rendered to the divine Master.

And whoso shall receive one such little child in my name receiveth me. (Matt. 18:5.)

Grafting an Eye

The other day Mamie Ost entered the Flower Hospital in New York with an injured eye. Dr. Royal S. Copeland, dean of the faculty of the hospital, found that it would be necessary to remove the injured eye to save the sight of the other. There was in the hospital at the same time a Chinese patient named Sing Long, the cornea of whose left eye had become blind through an infection. Dr. Copeland determined to try an operation of Von Hippel, a German scientist, who had successfully transplanted the cornea of a rabbit's eye to a human eye. Consequently a piece of the woman's eye was transferred to the eye of the Chinaman, and it has been knitted into that organ. The doctor will tear away enough tissue to make a new pupil, and it looks now as though the operation will be a complete success, and the Chinaman will have his sight restored. The Saviour in his Sermon on the Mount refers to the physical eye as the organ of human vision, and by it illustrates the conscience as the eye of the soul.

The light of the body is the eye; if therefore thine eye be single, thy whole body shall be full of light; but if thine eye be evil, thy whole body shall be full of darkness. (Matt. 6:22, 23.)

Caught Between the Gates

A funeral coach returning from the cemetery was caught between the gates at the foot of the graveyard hill near Haverstraw, N. Y., the other day, and an engine running at fifty miles an hour struck the coach and killed all five of the occupants. The watchman was eating his luncheon in his little cabin when the tinkle of an electric bell warned him of an approaching train. Mechanically he pulled the lever that set the heavily balanced gates in motion. The coach had crossed the first of two tracks and the descending gates held it a prisoner on the rails, while the terrified occupants sat paralyzed, gazing at the rushing locomotive. The driver lashed his horses in a futile attempt to force the vehicle from the track. Fragments of splintered wood and mutilated shreds of humanity were found far and near. Mrs. E. V. Seifred, who was returning from the burial of her father, was found beside her husband fifty yards down the track. Twenty yards nearer lay William Bebe, the driver, the son of a wealthy livery man. The Rev. A. Romath, pastor of the New City M. E. Church, was also killed, and Mrs. Perry Kesler was so badly injured that she died that night. With every human precaution there are dangers and deaths, especially connected with the railroads, but the accidents are increased lamentably when there is any lack of human precaution. What a fearful responsibility the watchman has! We are all spiritual watchmen and are responsible in a large measure for the life or death of the souls of our fellow men. The apostle thus refers to this responsibility:

For they watch for your souls, as they that must give account. (Heb. 13:17.)

Fifty Thousand Turtles

By a telegram from New Orleans it is learned that fifty thousand live diamond-back turtles were shipped from that city recently in a tank car to New York. Mr. B. M. Wichens, who operates one of the largest turtle-breeding plants in the world in Jefferson Parish, across the river from New Orleans, filled the tank car with filtered cistern water and put in the necessary food to supply the creatures during the trip. To fill the large order in so short a time, it was found necessary to resort to artificial incubation, 200,000 eggs being put into warm water for the purpose. Most of the turtles are from three to six months old, the age at which they are most desirable. Each year the demand for sea food seems to increase, until that business has grown to enormous proportions, especially in the civilized portions of the world. The product of river, lake and sea has been standard food from the earliest ages. It was so in the time of our Lord. The disciples he selected were most of them fishermen. When the Saviour met the eleven after his resurrection and was revealing himself to their doubtful minds, he said to them:

Have ye here any meat? And they gave him a piece of broiled fish, and of a honeycomb. And he took it, and did eat before them. (Luke 24:41-43.)

Afraid Duck Would Drown

Gerald H. Floss, a lad four years old, living near Montclair, N. J., had a pet duck of which he was very fond. He was not aware that his duck could swim. They were walking together along the banks of the creek when the duck made for the water. Gerald thought sure that his pet would drown, and he started heroically to rescue it from a watery grave. As he ran his foot struck a root and he tumbled with his face in the water and was rapidly drowning. Harold Dickson, who was driving an express wagon, saw the boy motionless and rushed to his aid. By working the child's arms and rolling him on the ground he restored him to consciousness. The first thing the lad said as he came to himself was, "Where is my ducky?" The boy's tenderness and heroism were ideal, but his wisdom was faulty and came near being fatal. We hear people constantly saying it makes no difference what a man believes so long as he is honest in his belief. The boy was honest in the belief that his duck could not swim, but his belief came very near being disastrous to him. It is our duty to obey conscience, but no more than it is to have the conscience regulated by the Word of God. Paul was honest in his belief that he was doing God service in persecuting the Christians, but that honesty did not justify his murderous acts.

And I persecuted this way unto the death, binding and delivering into prisons both men and women. (Acts 22:4.)

THE HOME QUEEN'S REALM

Women in Council

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

TWO or three very practical questions have been sent me by new friends since last we women met in council. There are points on which I feel myself entirely at a loss, having had no experience to guide me in the circumstances represented. When such points meet my eyes I say, joyfully, "There are numbers of good women who know everything that is to be known on these puzzling subjects," and I hand the matter with confidence down to them. In the first letter published this week:

A Friend Asks Advice

"I wish to join the circle you are forming and become one of the 'Women in Council.' My life is a lonely one and years ago I could not have foreseen what it would be at the present time. Without having the heart of an 'old maid,' I have arrived at spinsterhood. My home is carried on in a sort of joint partnership with a relative who is an old soldier, a veteran of the Civil War. He is married, and his wife keeps house. I came with them not long ago into a new country, a hundred miles from our old home. The understanding was that I was to raise poultry for profit. Since coming here objections of every kind have been made to my doing so. The outbuildings on this farm are not in good repair. I am told that a woman in delicate health cannot properly care for poultry in winter. I wish to pay a debt of nine hundred dollars in five years, and think I ought to be able to do it by raising chickens, selling eggs, etc. Is there any one who can give me information on this subject? I could have bought an incubator a month ago. As it is, I am now paying for the food of a diminutive flock of hens of my own, and am doing the same for a flock that belongs to my relatives. The weather has ruined our fruit crops. If I cannot succeed with poultry I shall not be able to make my semi-annual payments. A. P. C."

How Shall One Get Out of a Rut?

There are ruts in life's road that sometimes lead, one would think, into Bunyan's Slough of Despond, yet brave hearts manage to maintain their cheer in the midst of trials too hard for words. The revelation given in the following letter is enough to move the compassionate sympathy of every reader. Listen to this life story:

"I want to get out of a rut, and raise my children for God. I am one of the sisters with whom fate has gone hard. After living with my husband sixteen years and becoming the mother of nine children, with a tenth in prospect, my husband one morning mounted his horse and rode away. I expected his return in a fortnight, but at the end of that time heard that he had gone to Old Mexico, with no intention of returning. He had been a kind husband and a devoted father, but everything had gone wrong financially, and he gave up in despair. I have been almost a wreck in mind and body, but now that I am able to think clearly I have determined to forget the past and, as far as I can, try to reach a plane of greater elevation. I cannot stay in the rut. From my lonely country home I appeal to the good friends of the Council. Have you words of comfort to me? A. P."

Your children must at least begin to assist in bearing your burdens. Notwithstanding all the trouble you have had to bear, keep on believing that God's in his heaven, all's right with the world.

Wanted—More Time to Read

"How is a housekeeper to secure time to read? How much time is she justified in spending in this way? This is one of the questions I send to the Women in Council. With my household cares and sewing I manage to study my Sunday School lesson, to read THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and the daily paper, but I have to read in a hurry and often there are articles that I am compelled to pass by. I wonder if this is a perplexity which Mrs. Sangster can aid me to solve? A. F."

I understand the situation. It is not easy to sit down in the daytime and read a book when the mending basket is full to the overflow, when meals must be cooked, and a house kept in apple-pie order. Still, if you would resolve to take an hour for your very own after the dinner dishes were cleared away in the early afternoon, you would find yourself rested by the reading of a good book, and, if not all at once, by gradual degrees the children would learn that mother was not to be disturbed at that particular time. Sit in your easiest chair and put your feet in another, if need be, and take to yourself the privileges which ought to be a housekeeper's own. Probably others of the sisters will tell you to read in the evening, but by the time night comes I am afraid you are too tired to enter into the spirit of a book.

My Little Daughter's Hair

"My little daughter of six has a beautiful head of hair. It is soft and thick and hangs three inches below her waist. Friends tell me that I must cut it, if I wish her to have fine hair when she is grown. I am reluctant to do so, if it can be helped. What shall I do?"

This question is passed on for the consideration of mothers.

REVERIE

A drowsy bird has sung his vesper song;
The sunset glow is fading from the sky.
Upon my spirit happy memories throng;
Pensive I sit and muse on days gone by.
To one dear heart I send a wistful sigh—
Come hither, darling, do not long delay.

Maternal Tyranny

MOTHERS do not mean to be despots, yet tl sometimes bear heavily upon the freedom their grown children, while deceiving the selves with the idea that their motives are pure a that they are doing right. For example, a st was sent to the editor of this page the other day which the following incident was related: T eldest son of a family of five children is now a lit beyond forty. The youngest of the group is p thirty. All are self-supporting, and the family in comfortable circumstances. The mother is tremely opposed to the marriage of her eldest s apparently because she wishes to keep him entir to herself. He has been for several years enga to a lovely girl, his means are sufficient for the s port of a home, and the desire of his life is to h a hearth of his own. The mere m tion of his marriage distresses mother so that she can hardly spe and her gloom falls like a weight u her whole domestic circle. This mot is a conscientious Christian woman, her maternal tyranny is by way ruining the lives of her children, an causes her to behave with compl injustice to a son who has reac middle life.

Not long ago, the question was as concerning a household where th are several unmarried daughte women of undoubted charm, "w those Blythe girls had remained s gle?" The answer given by a nei bor was: "In the eyes of their mot they are children still, although t girlhood is long past. She overshad them on every side. She dictates w they shall do, where they shall with whom they shall associate, what they shall wear, precisely as did when they were in their teens. a man happen to call at the house, can never see Lucile, Cornelia Dorothy by herself. He is obliged meet a phalanx of women with M Blythe at their head, and the ordin masculine caller is frightened away once. The mother is tenderly lo yet her selfish and gentle tyranny stood in the way of her daught development. A feather-bed tyra may be in reality as depressing in results as the tyranny of an iron ha

What to Do and How to Do It

"I waited," said timid woman other day, "alm an hour after I ready to take my leave, because could not muster courage enough rise in the presence of others, say 'g afternoon' to my hostess and get my out of the room." The embarrassm felt by a diffident person, unaccustor to take the initiative in society, i genuine distress. ✳ Young People's Societies ✳

The Model Society*

NOBODY would think of manufacturing any article without a pattern—from the dressmaker to the housebuilder. If there is a new invention, it is made after proper measurements, and accurately to fit some recognized need.

At first, such an invention is usually more or less crude and inefficient. Little by little, if it is really founded upon a legitimate want, it approaches perfection. At last, it may become adapted exactly to its purpose. Then it is a model for others, and those others must resemble it in every detail.

Thus also with the mind and the spirit. We must have ideals. Each has one, whether he knows it or not.

The boy's imagination may be captured by some swaggering profligate, whose fashionable clothes and confident air give him a meretricious consequence. Insensibly the boy cherishes the picture, and unless some gracious counter influence intervenes, he becomes, in the expressive slang phrase, a "cheap sport"—contemptible in the eyes of right-thinking people and offensive to God.

The girl sees some shallow young woman, decked in tawdry finery, perhaps talking and laughing loudly. The ignorant child resolves that she will dress and act in the same way as soon as she is old enough.

Or some noble and dignified person may lay his impress upon the child-mind when the mood of that sensitive film is just right—and, lo! a whole life will be transformed.

Generally the ideal which we cherish in our minds, consciously or unconsciously, is derived piecemeal from our environment—a little borrowed from this source, a little from that.

Says Mozley, the great English preacher: "Take an ordinary man of the world—what he thinks and what he does, his whole standard of duty, is taken from the society in which he lives. It is a borrowed standard. He is as good as other people are; he does, in the way of duty, what is generally considered proper and becoming among those with whom his lot is cast. But there are those who stand out from among the crowd which reflects merely the atmosphere of feeling around it, with an impress upon them which betokens a heavenly birth. How has the person become possessed of it? Has he brought it from the society around him? That cannot be, because it is wholly different from that of the world around him. It is not borrowed. It is the individual's own. It rises up from some fount within—it is a creation of which a certain text says: 'We know not whence it cometh.'"

For it is "born of the Spirit."

The great characteristic of Christ is perhaps his life-giving power.

There are degrees of life. Some people seem to be full of it. Others seem to have little. Christ came, he says, that we, who perhaps have a little life, might have it "more abundantly."

The individual soon shows how much life he has, and reveals its source. Equally the society soon shows its vitality or its lack. If it grows, if it elevates the character of its members, if it becomes a life-giving force in the community, you know that it is of Christ, and that it is modeled upon his instructions. "He that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life."

If it does not grow, if its members are worldly, unfaithful, uninterested in the things of the kingdom, if it is a nentity in the community, it is not of Christ.

And recollect that each member of our society is a representative. You bear its good name in your keeping, "whether it be of Christ or no." It will be judged by your behavior.

Christian Endeavor Topic for Sunday, July 10, TEXT: 1. Cor. 12 : 4-27.

The Christian's Resources*

WE often ask concerning a man, "How much is he worth?"

There are many senses in which this question could be understood, but the one universally accepted refers solely to his property.

It is hard for the average human mind to realize that heavenly property is worth more than earthly; that treasure in heaven far outweighs the gold of all the mines; and that it is nothing for a man to gain the whole world, if his soul is not saved.

Selfishness and covetousness were well weighed by our Saviour. His sermons contained many denunciations of them. We are told to give without stint; to take no thought for the morrow; and that it is easier for a camel to go through the needle's eye than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God.

All this was said largely because Christ wished men to realize the futility and meanness of all earthly possessions compared with the glory and grandeur of the infinite wealth of heaven, and the spiritual blessings bestowed by the Most High. "All things are yours," says the inspired apostle in one of his most passionate bursts of eloquence; "life, death, things present and things to come."

He meant, everything that is worth while—the love, faith, hope, set before us in the Gospel; eternity, the white robe, the peace and beauty of heaven; all, all belong to the Christian.

It is true that he has to pay the price. He must run the hard race—he must keep the faith—daily work, patient striving, many discouragements; but what do they matter, when so great a prize lies before him, and he can draw daily for support upon the limitless resources of God's love?

Mrs. Elizabeth Hills Lyman tells of watching in her girlhood with a delirious patient. She was full of fear, but through the long night she supported her courage with Scripture texts. She dates the growth of her highest qualities from that night, when she realized the help that lies in our Bible.

The terrible period of darkness which we call the Middle Ages, including roughly the millennial comprised between the fall of Rome in 476 and the discovery of America in 1492, is generally considered to be an almost unrelieved night. Governments were unstable in every country. Rulers were often robbers and murderers. Learning fled to the cloisters. Education was neglected. It was the most sordid and the least spiritual of ages.

Longfellow, in his lofty poem of "Christus," while recognizing the chaos and horror of that awful period, has shown how through it all ran "a bright, deep stream of Faith, strong enough for all the exigencies of life and death."

Thus, even in this gloomy time, God, as the poet says, revealed his power. Among the mass of corrupt nobles and churchmen shines out now and again some saintly form, like St. Francis or Savonarola, or a pure ruler like Alfred; and he puts into the mouth of one of his chief characters a recognition of God's great leading throughout the years:

> Oh, yes; a tower of strength indeed,
> A present help in all our need.
> A sword and buckler is our God.
> Innocent men have walked unshod
> O'er burning plowshares, and have trod
> Unharmed on serpents in their path,
> And laughed to scorn the devil's wrath.

So from the first days, through the worst that men have known, and up to our very own, the power of our God is made manifest. He can supply all our needs with the endless riches of his grace.

BISHOPRIC WALL BOARD — Is Cheaper and Better Than Lath and Plaster

This practical substitute for lath and plaster is easily nailed to studding. Being applied dry, it is at once ready for decoration—paint, paper or burlap. Saves time and labor; is clean and sanitary; proof against cold, heat, dampness, vermin.

Bishopric Wall Board is made of kiln-dried dressed lath, imbedded in hot Asphalt Mastic, and surfaced with sized cardboard; is cut at the factory into uniform sheets 4x4 ft. sq. and three-eighths of an inch thick. These sheets (delivered in crates) are easily and quickly nailed to studding ready for wall paper, paint or burlap.

Guaranteed Proof Against Moisture, Heat, Cold, Sound and Vermin

ITS MANY USES:—Bishopric Wall Board is used for dwellings, pleasure, health resort and factory buildings, new partitions in old buildings, finishing attics, cellars, porches, laundries, garages.

Price $2.50 per 100 sq. ft. or $6.40 per crate of 256 sq. ft. f.o.b. factories, New Orleans, Cincinnati or Alma, Mich.

Write to-day for Free Samples and Booklet.

BISHOPRIC SHEATHING — Is Cheapest for Frame or Cement Buildings

Bishopric Sheathing is made of same materials and in the same way as Wall Board, but finish is not necessarily so fine and therefore costs less. It is cheaper than lumber, affords better protection, is applied in less time, makes a smoother job and does away with building paper. Bishopric Sheathing, like Wall Board, is delivered in crates ready for immediate application.

It is guaranteed proof against heat, cold, dampness, sound and vermin. Allows dead air space between laths and weather board, forming splendid insulation.

Our free booklet fully explains its many uses and advantages over lumber in both frame and cement construction. Also used with excellent results as a lining for dairy barns, poultry houses, stables or other outdoor buildings.

Price $2 per 100 sq. ft. or $5.12 per crate of 256 sq. ft. f.o.b. New Orleans, Cincinnati or Alma, Mich.

The Strawberry Handkerchief

A Tale of Colonial Days in Old New York

By AMELIA E. BARR

CAPTAIN VAN VROOM, discussing with Harry Rutgers the settlement with Batavius, decided that he would not give up the land he had given as a site for the house Batavius was to build for Virginia.

Harry laughed. "I have no doubt," he answered, "that Dieterich has full instruction about the land, in case you refuse it as 'damages' for Virginia's breach of promise. In a month all will be settled." And one morning towards the end of March, Jansen walked into 14 Wall Street as sole master on the premises. He had had a new sign painted, and Katrina walked down town to see it. The simple inscription, "JANSEN VAN VROOM," pleased her very much. She thought she had never seen her husband's name look better.

"But I wish, Katrina, I could have put Arent's name with mine."

Katrina's face grew sad, and with a sigh she answered, "Thou could not. He will marry that English girl."

"What we can not change we must bear. And there is good news from London—Anna Bradley told me so."

Not long after Jansen received his letter from Batavius, Virginia had one from Rose. It was full of affection, but the drop of disappointment was in it. She had not seen Joris. She had sent for him the morning after she landed, and was broken-hearted when told that Squire Settle and Lieutenant Artaveldt had left at daylight for Settlebourne.

Virginia told her mother "it was a very sweet letter," and she tried hard to believe every word of it. But some seed of distrust sprang from reading it. She said to herself: Rose arrived in London at daylight, why did she not send for Joris in the afternoon of that day?

"But Joris will come to me," she mused. "In spite of delays, in spite of everything ill-fortune can do, Joris will come."

About this time the robins began to come oftener, and to dispute the branches on which they would build, and there were other manifest signs that winter was over.

But the crowning joy of this spring was the news full of hope that every ship began to bring from England. The colonists heard that the King was distracted; that, even around the throne, the legality of the Stamp Act was ridiculed and disputed; if he left his palace he was followed by angry crowds shouting "Repeal the Stamp Act!"

New Yorkers heard these and similar reports, and the very streets seemed conscious of the return of prosperity. Men were looking after their long-closed stores, overhauling their ships, repainting their wagons and drays. The women gladly caught the same spirit. They were weary to death of spinning and weaving, and had, besides, that usual womanly spring fever that is only cured by a spring cleaning.

One afternoon Virginia found Madame with all her silver before her—pots and urns, cups and vases.

"Shall I help you, moeder?" asked Virginia.

"Dear one, I would like some help. This morning I was dreaming of Arent. He stood at the bow of the Manhattan, and his face was smiling, and his brown hair blowing in the wind, and his ship dancing over the waves like a sea bird. He is coming, Virginia! He is bringing good news! We can begin the spring cleaning as soon as we like."

Katrina was not wrong. On the 18th of May, A.D. 1766, when New York had put on her most beautiful spring weather, Jansen went down to the Van Vroom wharf, and stood there looking eastward with longing eyes. Suddenly he shifted his position, and shielded his eyes from the sun.

"I believe that is the Manhattan!" suddenly he cried, with deep emotion. "I know her! I know her! courtesying like a duchess she comes! Flying like a swallow — up and down — up and down! Arent must be at the wheel. He always brings his ship in racing as if a victory she had won."

His heart was full of mingled feelings—gratitude, pride, hope, anxiety, love and longing. He could not let the dear ship out of sight, but he sent messengers far and near with the news; so that when the Manhattan came to anchor, it was amid the wildest cheers of welcome. "The Stamp Act repealed!" shouted the crowd on the ship, and the crowd on the wharf took up the joyful cry, and carried it through every street in the city.

And it was impossible for the deputies whom Arent had carried to London to get clear of the crowds. They wanted to know how the Commons received the Memorial of the Colonial Congress.

But Arent took no part in these explanations and assurances. As soon as he had waited upon the Governor with his great news, he went home. Katrina and Virginia were both eagerly watching for him. The mother thought only of her boy, and of his triumph in being the first bringer of good tidings. Virginia, while dearly loving her brother, and heartily joining in the general rejoicing, had her own special hope added.

About the Stamp Act, Arent declined to talk. He said he "was weary of it, and that his father would want to go over the whole ground as soon as he came home." Indeed, Lady Rose, and London life and city, seemed to fill his heart and his memory, and to be the sum of his anticipations.

When his meal was finished he went into the garden, and as he walked amid the sweets of spring and lilac-tide, he seemed to be lost in a happy reverie.

And Virginia had that delicacy of feeling which forbade her to intrude her own hopes or sorrows, if others did not lead the way. No one, however, seemed to remember either her or her lover. Madame's heart was full of Arent and his affairs. Virginia she had always with her.

Her mother entered while she was pondering, and said a little crossly: "Why now art thou looking sad? What is the matter with thee? Here is the tax repealed, and thy brother first with the news of it!"

"Moeder, I am glad for every one to-day. I was only thinking that Arent never once spoke of Joris. I wonder that Rose sent me no letter. I wonder if she has told Joris what she promised me to tell him."

"Thou art right. Why? Why? I will tell thee why. Rose thinks of nothing but Arent. Arent thinks of nothing but Rose. Go and ask thy brother in so many straight words—why?"

So Virginia went into the summer-house and called Arent to her. He came at once, sat by her side, took her hand, and said, "My dear sister!"

"Well, then," she asked, "have you no letter? No word of any kind for me?"

"I have no letter, for when I went to bid Rose good-by the men were waiting at the anchor, and I had not a moment to spare—and Rose had not finished her letter to you."

"I understand. Did she send me no message? Had she seen Joris Artaveldt?"

"Yes, indeed! And very impertinent he was to her."

"Are you not saying too much? When did Rose see Joris?"

"Joris and his ridiculous old cousin got back to London the day before repeal. Rose, the dear one, had been watching day and night for him."

"Arent! Day and night——"

"When Joris returned he had Rose's command to attend her at once—and, of course—he did so; though he made unpleasant remarks about being 'very weary with the long, hard drive from Yorkshire.'"

"I dare say he was very tired."

"He need not have told Rose that. Fancy any one being tired when they were asked to see Lady Rose Harley! She looked angelic, I am sure; and she received him in one of their most splendid parlors; but Joris—after all their friendship, too—was quite cold and indifferent. Poor Rose was dashed at once by his behavior, and could scarcely begin her story. I don't see how you could ask her to do it."

"Arent, surely you did not try to prevent her?"

"What was the good of bringing up all that old foolishness?"

"The good? Well, the happiness of two lives."

"He never helped her by a single word of pity, or excuse—just let her go on blaming herself, and clearing you—till she broke down, and began to cry with mortification."

"Did he not say one comforting word?"

"Not one. On the contrary, he told her she had sacrificed your happiness for the King, and even insinuated that she hoped for a reward from the Privy Purse—or some other particular sign of the royal favor. Then Lady Rose became very angry, and told him his abominable pride and temper had nearly killed you, and Joris rose and bowed himself out of the room."

"I am sorry Rose lost her temper. It was unkind to me, for now I know nothing."

"I don't see how you could marry a man with such a temper. Give the impertinent fellow up."

"This impertinent Joris! Do you think he will ever come to New York again?"

"He actually asked me for a passage for his cousin and himself. His cousin I can not bear. Rose, too, considers him tiresome and vulgar, and he is constantly talking, talking. I could not put up with Squire Settle."

"So you refused Joris a passage?"

"I told him I had no room. I made it as polite as I could."

"On the next ship he may come?"

"On the ship that brings the Repeal Act to the Governor, he will come. He said his cousin preferred it, but had been willing to humor his hurry. A prouder bit of human flesh than Joris Artaveldt does not exist."

"Spirit, you mean, Arent?"

"Flesh, too. The way he flings up his head, his quick, short speech, the toss of his velvet cloak, the tilt of his sword, the cock of his beaver, everything he does and says. The fact is, Virginia, he has been ruined by the way Londoners have treated him."

"Others have been spoiled in London, besides Joris. I should not think Rose would like to marry you, if you change much more. You are cruelly selfish, and proud also, Arent."

"I have always had a proud nature."

"Yes, but you were proud of great things—of outriding a big storm—of a quick voyage—of saving life."

"Well, then, I am proud yet of such things."

"Perhaps. But also now, you are proud of titles, of fine dress."

"Come, come, sister, mind your own affairs. Arent knows his chart, he is not going out of his right course. Better it will be for you to go into the house, and help our moeder—meat and drink must be at hand, for a crowd fader may bring home with him."

On the contrary, the Captain brought no one with him but McLeod, and both men were completely worn out.

It was evident Arent had not brought much private comfort to his home. He was so jealous of Rose, that he resented conversation concerning her. It seemed a kind of presumption for even his mother and sister to use her name in common speech, or to speculate about her sayings and doings. He himself hardly named her, but he thought of her continually. Already the lover had begun "to leave father and mother" and cleave to the woman who was to be his wife; and the father and mother, perforce, to teach themselves to take daily life independent of his presence and affection.

So the supper table was happy enough without Arent, and indeed like to be the happier for his absence; since to his mother and sister Arent had expressed the utmost distaste and weariness of the Stamp Act. "And no wonder!" said Katrina apologetically; "he has heard nothing else for four months, shut up in his ship with it, and in London forced to listen to it morning, noon, and night. Sometimes we have been weary of it, Virginia. Yet we must hear about the repeal of the tiresome thing, so I am glad McLeod came home with your fader. After to-night we put it out of hearing—we name it no more. But this night, yes, we will talk of it." So they were hardly seated round the table, before Madame asked, "When did the Manhattan reach London, McLeod?"

"Two days after Christmas, Madame; but signs o' Christmas merriment were few, and far between. The King was going crazy wi' anger at our impertinent disobedience to him, which he complained 'Parliament was allowing to go unpunished.' He thought himself insulted by the extremely humiliating conduct of you New Yorkers, and the Boston men no better—not a whit to choose between them—and he considered the surrender o' the stamps to the citizens of New York was such a serious matter that he called Parliament together to consult anent its punishment."

"But what did Parliament do?"

"Quarreled and fought o'er that bit of provoking paper, as if the nation depended on it. Pitt abused Newcastle, insulted Lord Bute, and defied Parliament, telling them they had taxed America without a shadow of right to do so."

To be concluded

An Interesting Life-Story

Marion Harland's Autobiography, the Story of a Long Life (Harper & Bros., New York and London), will be read with much interest, as it is the record of a career that is in many respects wonderful. There are few better known names in American literature. Here we have the author's own description of the dawning of literary aspiration and the long and brilliant career that has followed. Mrs. Terhune has personally known many of the leading public men and women of the last half century and her recollections are delightfully entertaining. Among other things she tells the story of her famous journey to the Holy Land in 1889 as the correspondent of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, her letters of travel among the "sacred places" having been one of the absorbing features of the paper that year. The Autobiography is a handsome volume of 498 pages. Cloth bound, price $2.

Feeding on the Words of Jesus*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

THE catacombs at Rome were the burial places of the early Christians. They are about five hundred and eighty miles in extent and are said to have contained 6,000,000 bodies. During the persecutions of the Christians under Nero and other Roman emperors, the catacombs were used for hiding places. Under Diocletian the catacombs were crowded with those for whom there was no safety in the face of day. The art of the catacombs is unique and most interesting. Simple designs are etched in the slabs which seal the tombs. Now and then are small chapels where paintings are to be found. All are Bible illustrations, so that the catacombs may be said to be a pictorial Bible in effect.

Basketfuls for Feeding the Multitude

During the last few weeks twenty-six millions of Sunday School scholars have had their souls fed by review of the lessons in Matthew's Gospel from chapters nine to fifteen.

The report given at the World's Sunday School Convention last May divides them into German groups, French groups, English groups, etc., the United States having by far the largest group.

How the "Baskets" Were Filled

The first basket contained the account of the raising from the dead by Jesus of the twelve-year-old daughter of Jairus. And two blind men had their sight restored by Jesus, and a woman was cured of a sickness which she had endured for twelve years. She was healed by simply touching the garment of Jesus. How has the Sunday School world been fed by this lesson? We have learned of the loving sympathy of Jesus. We no longer fear death, because Jesus has power over it. We are encouraged to ask his help when we are suffering.

A little girl and her papa were on their way home, hand in hand, when the child in her playfulness said: "Now, papa, let's play I am a poor blind girl, and you must let me hold your hand tight, and you must lead me along, and tell me where to step and how to go." So the merry blue eyes were shut tight, and the walk began. "Now step up; now step down; here we go around the corner," and so on until they reached home, when the little one said: "Wasn't it nice, papa? I never peeped once." "But," said her mamma, "didn't you feel afraid you would fall?" With a look of trusting love came the answer: "Oh, no, mamma, I had tight hold of papa's hand, and I knew he would take me safely over the hard places."

Let us have a similar trust in God. Read in Ezek. 33: 22; 40: 1; Luke 1: 66 about the hand of the Lord being with those who trust him.

The second basket contains the lesson about Jesus sending out his twelve apostles by twos to preach the Gospel, and to heal the sick, and to cast out demons. The food we get out of this basket is the encouragement to believe that Jesus may use us as fellow helpers to the truth. He has small errands for children to do, like taking a flower to a sick person, or food to some one who is poor. He has large things for the older people to do to help in making this a better world here and now.

The third basket has in it the lesson about John the Baptist in prison. He would not have been there if he had not bravely rebuked the wickedness of Herod and Herodias. Courage is the food we find in this basket. Let us never stop to measure danger when we have a duty to perform.

John and Charles Wesley were outspoken preachers, and oftentimes their lives were threatened by angry mobs. It was while hiding from such a mob one day that Charles Wesley wrote that matchless hymn, "Jesus, Lover of My Soul."

The fourth basket has in it the lesson about the wicked cities of Chorazin, Bethsaida and Capernaum, whose inhabitants would not become the followers of Jesus though they had often heard his wise teaching, and had seen his wonderful works of healing the lame and blind and sick. This food would seem to be very bitter, but Jesus makes it sweet by telling us that those who will love and serve him shall have sweet peace in their souls. "Come unto me and I will give you rest." The Roman Emperor Augustus heard of a man who was accustomed to sleep all the night through though he had many cares and was heavily burdened with debt. The emperor desired to buy his bed, and when asked why, he replied "that it seemed to him to be some wonderful bed, worth the buying, whereon a man could sleep that was so deeply engaged." But he was mistaken; it was not the bed, but the yoke of Christ that enabled the man to sleep. Worry is what keeps people awake in their beds in the watches of the night. Many suggestions have been offered to induce sleep, but nothing is so soothing as to commune with God.

The fifth basket has in it the lesson about the Sabbath. The Pharisees found fault with Jesus for permitting his disciples to pick off only enough grain to satisfy their hunger as they were passing through the field. They also found fault with Jesus because he healed a man's withered hand on the Sabbath day. Jesus was the Lord of the Sabbath, and he knew better than they how to keep the Sabbath day holy. The food for us in this basket will help us to keep God's Sabbaths in a way that will be pleasing to him.

The sixth basket has in it the lesson about some people who hated Jesus, and wanted to make others think that he was not the Son of God, but the helper of Satan. Do you think there is bitter food in this basket? Jesus has made it sweet, because he has told us about his resurrection from the dead, which would prove him to be the Son of God. And more than this, he has promised that because he rose from the dead, we shall rise also. Dr. Bonar has said: "The heathen sorrowed without hope. A shattered pillar; a ship gone to pieces; a race lost; a harp lying on the ground with snapped strings, with all its music lost; a flower bud crushed—these were the sad utterances of their hopeless grief. The thought of death came not to cheer the parting, or brighten the sepulchre."

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

The seventh basket has in it the lesson about the death of John the Baptist. And how terrible was that death! His head cut from his body by a sword, because a wicked king had told a fiendish young girl that he would give her whatever she would ask of him. What fool did the Sunday School world find in this? First: Not to cherish a grudge in the heart against any one as Herod did against John. It has led to murder many times. Second: Be very careful not to make a bad promise. Third: It is better to break a bad promise than to keep it. The whole world would have honored Herod if he had refused to behead John when Salome requested it.

The eighth basket is filled with the lesson about Jesus feeding the multitude with five loaves and two fishes. He had sought rest after his many labors, but the change opened up even greater activity, and he knew no weariness until after he had fed the people and sent them to their homes.

The ninth basket has in it the lesson about Jesus walking on the sea. In this we will find food to strengthen our faith. Peter might have walked on the waves all the way from the boat to Jesus if he had had more faith; as it was, his little faith enabled him to take a few steps. He began to sink only when he lost his faith.

The tenth basket contains the lesson about the mother who came to Jesus and asked him to cure her little daughter. She was not just the kind of a mother that Jesus had been used to hearing, but because she begged him so earnestly and had such strong faith that he could cure her daughter, Jesus said it should be done. This is a good basket for mothers to take food from. Jesus is more willing to help them with their children than they think. And it should make children happy to know that Jesus listens to their mothers' prayers.

A boy was one day passing his mother's door, and he heard her praying. She mentioned his name, and prayed that God would help him to be a Christian boy, and grow up to be a Christian man. Day after day he thought about his mother's prayer, and he did decide to be a Christian. That mother's prayer was an anchor to his soul as long as he lived.

The eleventh basket has in it the lesson about the sower who sowed his grain in four kinds of ground in his field. There was ground that was trodden until it was hard, stony ground, thorny places, and good soil. But only the grain in the good ground brought forth fruit. Those who heard this parable of Jesus, and those, like ourselves who read it in the Bible, may feed upon his words and grow, and bear the fruit of goodness.

The twelfth basket has in it another lesson about a sower. He sowed good seed in good ground, but in the night his enemy came and sowed bad seed, and that grew with the good seed, so there was in the harvest both good fruit and bad fruit. When Jesus spoke this parable he wanted to teach the people that there are two kinds of persons—those who are God's children, and those who are Satan's children. What is there in this for us? Are we wheat or tares?

There is a Japanese story about the ears and tongues that went to Paradise. A certain man died and went to Paradise. Kwanon, the goddess of mercy, met him at the gate of heaven and brought him at once to Amida, who said: "Since you are henceforth to be an inhabitant of Paradise, you ought at once to become acquainted with the general features of the place. Kwanon will act as your guide." Kwanon led out the man and showed him heaps of gold and precious stones; magnificent lotus flowers bloomed in eight wonderful lakes, and birds of paradise filled the air with notes sweeter than those of the nightingale. While wandering about, they came to a building filled with shelves, having on them two kinds of things. One looked like mushrooms and the other like fish-roes. "What are they?" the man asked. Kwanon answered: "Those that you think look like mushrooms are the ears of persons who listened to many sermons and instructions about being good, and yet their acts were so evil that their bodies were not allowed to enter here—only the ears!" And the man asked: "What are those that look like fish-roes?" Kwanon answered: "Some people are very skilful in telling others what to do to be good, but they do only evil themselves, so only their tongues are admitted to Paradise."

The thirteenth basket is filled with several kinds of things, seeds, bread, coins, pearls, fish, etc. And Jesus talked about each one in a way to make the people understand something about the kingdom of heaven. It is the Church of the living God. It is growing larger every day, and filling the whole earth. We do not mean church buildings, but loving, loyal hearts acknowledging Jesus as their king. Some one asked an old man, "What is the kingdom of heaven?" He put his hand on his heart and answered: "It is something here," and then he looked up to heaven and said, "And it is something there."

AN EXPRESSION OF CONFIDENCE

WE have just received the following letter from one of our subscribers commenting upon our guarantee, and we take pleasure in quoting it in part to show how thoroughly the majority of our readers have come to ben sympathy with our efforts to protect their interests:

"B———, MINN., May 23, 1910.

"Dear Christian Herald: We have been a constant subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for a dozen years and expect to be as long as we live. We have often thought that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD had exhausted itself in its kind acts toward its readers, but when 'Our Guarantee' made its appearance in the paper, we were greatly touched and a prayer came to our lips asking God's choicest blessing to rest upon THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, for it will never be known in this world how much it will help the poor and inexperienced."

It is gratifying to receive an expression of confidence like the above. It shows our readers take our endeavors to protect their interests seriously. As a matter of fact, however, not only our readers but our regular advertising patrons have been with us from the first in the matter of our guarantee. We knew it would be a distinct benefit to both. Still it is pleasant to have it so acknowledged.

Whenever any of our subscribers is defrauded by an advertiser in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD we will make good the claim, provided that the subscriber, who must be of record, has mentioned THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in writing to the advertiser, and provided the claim is made to us within two months of the date of the appearance of the advertisement.

FAIRBANK'S SOAPS ARE GOOD SOAPS

Fairy Soap

Fairy Soap looks and is whiter than any other soap; moreover, it will retain its whiteness long after other so-called white soaps have turned yellow.

Fairy Soap is made from edible products and has a clean, delicate, refreshing smell; many other soaps have a strong, greasy, soapy—and, oft-times, rancid odor.

Fairy Soap is the best soap you can buy for the toilet and bath—no matter what you pay. Yet its price is but 5c.

Order Fairy Soap—the handy, floating, oval cake—today, and learn by use why it is the soap of soaps.

Fairy Soap was granted highest possible awards at both St. Louis and Portland Expositions.

"Have you a little 'Fairy' in your Home?"

Gold Dust

Several so-called "washing powders" are only sal soda. You can buy sal soda at your grocer's under its real name for much less than you can these powders.

Others contain naphtha, ammonia or some other liquid cleanser which evaporates the moment the powder is exposed to the air.

Gold Dust is a true washing powder. It is a mixture of vegetable oil soap and purifying ingredients which insure prompt and efficient cleansing action. It softens hard water, does its work quickly and well, and injures nothing. GOLD DUST will do more work and better work than any other washing powder on the market.

For washing dishes, scrubbing floors, cleaning woodwork, oilcloth, silverware and tinware, polishing brasswork, cleaning bathroom pipes, refrigerators, etc., softening hard water, washing clothes and making the finest soft soap.

"Let the Gold Dust Twins do your work"

Sunny Monday

Laundry Soap

Most yellow soaps contain from 20 to 40 per cent. rosin. Sunny Monday *(N. R.) is white, and contains not an ounce of rosin. Which would you prefer to use on your clothes—a soap containing about one-third rosin (a cheapening ingredient) or Sunny Monday *(N.R.) wherein the cheap rosin element is replaced with expensive fats and vegetable oils?

Sunny Monday *(N.R.) does the work with scarcely any rubbing and actually does double the work of any yellow rosin soap. Its dirt-starting quality is permanent and lasts until the cake is worn to a wafer.

*N.R. means "No rosin. Sunny Monday Laundry Soap contains no rosin. Rosin cheapens soap but injures clothes.

"Sunny Monday Bubbles will wash away your troubles"

Subscriber, Kingston, N. Y. Why is the liquor saloon where intoxicating beverages are sold, called the "great destroyer," "an enemy of God, the chief instrument of Satan"?

Because the saloon is a debaucher of manhood and annually destroys more lives, wrecks more careers, breaks up more homes and is the cause of more crime than any other known agency, if not more than all other agencies put together. It brutalizes humanity, breeds widespread poverty, destroys man's judgment, and renders him useless in business. The devil has no agency that does its work half as well as the saloon.

S. P. A., Peyton, Ore. 1. Did not one daughter of King Christian of Denmark become Czarina of Russia? If so, is she the present Dowager Empress? 2. What was the name of David's mother, and where is it given in the Bible?

1. Yes; Dagmar, daughter of the late King Christian of Denmark, who died in 1906, is the present Dowager Empress of Russia. She is sister of Alexandra, Queen-mother of England. 2. According to McClintock and Strong's Biblical Encyclopedia the name of David's mother is not known. From one or two allusions, however, in David's poetry it is gathered that she was a godly woman, and persuaded David to consecrate himself to God's service. Both of David's parents were alive until after he broke with Saul. See Ps. 86: 16 and I. Sam. 22: 3.

H. S. R., Greenwich, N. Y. How old is the famous cathedral of St. Mark at Venice?

The church was erected in 829 A. D., and enlarged and embellished at subsequent dates. The Piazza of St. Mark dates from 1592.

W. R. D., Newport, Vt. 1. What was the last name of the poet Dante? 2. Did he marry Beatrice?

1. Alighieri. 2. No; although devoted to her it is doubtful if he spoke with her. She married Simone di Bordi. Dante married a lady named Gemma di Mannetto Donati.

A. E. H., Olean, N. Y. The new Queen of England is spoken of as Victoria May of Teck. What and where is Teck?

Teck is an ancient German principality now held by the dukes of Wurtemberg.

A. B. R., Memphis, Tenn. What are the "Old Catholics"?

It is the name which was assumed by German Roman Catholics who rejected the dogma of papal infallibility in September, 1871. They were led by Professor Dollinger of Munich.

H. S. R., New York. When and by whom was the screw propeller invented?

The principle of the screw propeller was demonstrated by Hooke in 1681, and DeGuet, Bernouille and others worked on the idea. A patent for a propeller was taken out by Joseph Bramah in 1784. The first really successful one was made by Francis Pettit Smith, a farmer of Romney, England, who patented his invention in 1836. The first vessel using it was the Archimedes in 1838 on the Thames.

T. F. C., Norfolk, Va. 1. What is the average height of the lower clouds? 2. What is the average height of the upper?

1. The lower clouds, usually the strato-cumulus, are at an average height of 6,500 feet. 2. The upper clouds, usually the cirrus or hair clouds, are at an average height of 30,000 feet.

P. McP., Harrisburg, Pa. Is Michael Davitt, the Irish agitator, still living?

No; he died in 1906.

Mrs. D. H. R., Bay City, Mich. I can't do without THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It has helped me to be a better Christian and to do better Christian work. As I read over its pages, it has a divine influence on my mind. I think I like it better than I did the Home Herald. What does predestination mean?

Predestination is a doctrine regarding which there is a great difference of opinion among good Christian people. It has been a subject of endless controversy. It is taught in both the Old and New Testaments, but Jesus' teaching showed the sovereignty and will of God to be beneficent. His love and providence covered all; it was not his will that any should perish. Christ came into the world not to condemn but to save—a predestined mission of salvation and grace. Even those who were to be drawn to him—the chosen ones—were to come naturally and by an act of voluntary choice; for it is God who draws and man who comes. In all this there is nothing to conflict with the doctrine that it is God's hand that directs all events. As one commentator writes: "The roots of the Divine election are planted in God's unsearchable love, by which it appears as the supreme act of grace." Thus, each individual who belongs to the host of God's people and is living the Christ-life in the Divine strength, is an object of Divine regard and is only now fulfilling the high destiny designed for him. God's elective grace had in view the restoration of the whole world.

M. A. J., Claremont, N. H. What is the meaning of the term Ditheism?

It means the worship of two gods.

O. L., Charleston. Who was the artist who painted the picture in the Capitol at Washington of the signing of the Declaration of Independence?

The picture was painted by John Trumbull, who made his fame by pictures of historical events in American history and by portraits of famous Americans.

H. H. N., Southport, L. I. Who was the "Great Conde" referred to in the romances of Dumas?

He was Louis II., Prince of Bourbon in France, born 1621; died 1686. He was a man of extraordinary courage and quick mind. He defeated the Spaniards at Rocroi in 1643, when he was but twenty-two. He played a prominent part in the French civil wars of the seventeenth century. Compelled to flee from France, he entered the Spanish service. Restored to his rank in France he fought against the Dutch. See Fitzpatrick's life—The Great Conde and the Fronde.

Canada Reader, Three Rivers, Quebec. 1. How long is the Connecticut River? 2. How far is it navigable? 3. Does it rise in Canada?

1. The Connecticut is about 400 miles long. 2. It is navigable for fifty miles from its mouth. 3. It rises in Coos County, N. H., but very near the Canadian line.

J. M., Germantown, Pa. What is the real attitude of the World Missionary Conference on unity in the mission field? I was much interested in the remarks on the subject in last week's CHRISTIAN HERALD. It would seem to be the reasonable solution of many difficulties.

As far as can be learned from the rather meagre cable reports, the Conference favors general unity of action in spiritual work among the heathen. This, of course, relates not only to the teaching of the essentials of Christianity, but to co-operation in all matters that will advance the missionary cause. We shall probably never attain perfect unity on many minor points of doctrine and church polity, but these need not be emphasized. Sir Andrew Frazer, who knows much about missionary work in the East, has suggested (1) no invasion by one church or society of territory already fully occupied by other Christian workers; (2) no tempting workers away from their allegiance to the service of a rival society, and (3) free inter-communication between all Christian missionary organizations and churches on general working plans.

H. P., Springfield, Ill. What was the most sanguinary battle in English history?

The battle of Towton, England, fought during the War of the Roses, on March 29, 1461. The Yorkists defeated the Lancastrians with a slaughter of 37,000 men. No quarter was given. The Yorkists suffered severely also before victory declared for them.

J. L. H., Conway Springs, Kan. 1. What is the proper pronunciation and definition of the word atonement? Is it at-one-ment, or a-tone-ment? 2. Did God send his Son into the world to reconcile the world to God, or to reconcile himself to the world?

1. Atonement (pronounced at-own-ment), means to cover over sin, to reconcile, to forgive, to render satisfaction to divine justice for the sins of mankind. 2. By virtue of the atonement of Jesus Christ, penitent sinners, who believe and accept him as Saviour, are reconciled to God and delivered from the just punishment of sin. Jesus' atonement was his bearing of that punishment for their sake. (See Col. 1: 20; Eph. 2: 16; II. Cor. 5: 20.)

M. M., Highland Falls, N. Y. What is the instrument with which physicians examine the interior of the eye?

The ophthalmoscope.

L. L., Hoboken, N. J. 1. What are the Prince of Wales feathers? 2. What does the motto "ich dien" mean? Have just read that the son of King George V. has been made Prince of Wales, and entitled to the above.

1. The three ostrich feathers borne above the crest of the Prince. The originals were found on the helmet of the King of Bohemia, who was killed at Crecy while acting as a volunteer in the French army August 26, 1346. The Black Prince adopted them. 2. It means "I serve," and was adopted at the same time as the three feathers.

O. P., Wichita, Kan. Is there a Hyde Park in Boston, as well as in London, England?

Boston has a suburb called Hyde Park.

E. N. B., Punta Gorda, Fla. Please explain Matt. 11: 11.

Jesus in this and the preceding passage was vindicating his forerunner from the suspicion of inconstancy and was proclaiming him a prophet, yet one who, in respect to spiritual privileges, was far behind the least of those "who were to be b of the Spirit and admitted into the fellowship Christ's body." He was the greatest of the dispensation prophets, yet less than the least the kingdom of heaven, because he preceded advent.

G. W. B., Vineyard Haven, Mass. How are m volcanoes produced?

Count Zeppelin's Airship, the First Aerial Passenger Car

TO Count Ferdinand Zeppelin, the famous German aeronaut, belongs the distinction of establishing the first regular passenger airship in the world. In his giant dirigible Deutschland, 485 feet long and with three motors of 330 horsepower, he carried twenty passengers from Friedrichshafen on Lake Constance to Duesseldorf, a distance of 300 miles, in nine hours. This was at the rate of 33 miles per hour, although the great balloon at times traveled 43 miles per hour. The Count himself was pilot; the weather was perfect; the time schedule was kept closely and villages and towns were passed at the scheduled hours.

EGYPT'S NATIONAL UNREST

An American Visitor's Impressions of the People Among Whom Roosevelt Lately Sojourned

By O. E. MOFFET

COLONEL ROOSEVELT'S visit to Egypt has called the attention of Americans to that country. My attention was once called to it a somewhat different manner.

While at Marseilles, France, I met a man from hio and passed a pleasant evening with him. We cupied adjoining rooms at the hotel. About mid-ght he began shouting in his sleep: "Ma fish, ma sh." which is Arabic for "I have nothing for you." Ruh, imshi," ("be off"). "Alla ya tik," ("may God ve thee"). He repeated these phrases over and er, and thrashed around in his bed. I became easy and, rapping on his door, asked he were ill. "No," he replied, "I ave been traveling in Egypt. Just rived here yesterday. I dreamed I as again surrounded by Egyptian ggars, and have been repeating my plies to them."

The average Egyptian regards all merican travelers as millionaires id madmen—the former, because ey are so lavish with their gifts; the tter because the objects of travel are unintelligible to the Oriental mind. Egypt, one should never give bak-ish, except for actual services ren-ered. Resist calmly but firmly every tempt at extortion. Never pay till e stipulated service is finished. Then ter you have paid a little more than e bargain called for, turn a deaf ear the protestations and entreaties at always follow. Bear in mind that e more bakshish you give, the more amorous becomes the applicant. Real anks and gratitude must not be ex-ected for gifts.

A friend of mine once broke one of ese rules, just to see what would ppen. As we passed through a little ud village twenty miles from Cairo, gave a sturdy beggar a millieme alf a cent). This beggar, accom-anied by others, followed us to the ge of the village, asking for more. y friend then gave him a piastre ive cents). They followed us a hun-ed yards or so and were more per-stent than before. When they showed disposition to go back, he gave them e piastres. They followed us half a ile and became very clamorous. I as afraid we would get into trouble d wanted him to stop it; but when ey began to lag, he gave them enty piastres. They followed us two miles, and the experiment might have ended seriously, had we not met a company of travelers with a dragoman who sent the beggars about their business. This may help you to understand Egyptian character.

When Colonel Roosevelt, in his address before the students of the University of Egypt, denounced the slayer of Premier Boutros Pasha, and those who condone his act, and when he told them frankly, in another address, that the country was better off under British rule than it would be under native, the tendency was to calm rather than stir up the opposition to the present government. The opposition clamored for an address on the blessings of liberty and self-government. Can you imagine what the clamor would have become had they received it?

The visitor to Egypt is surprised at the order and progress evolved out of chaos and barbarism by the twelve years of English occupancy. Irrigation has nearly doubled the fertility of the valley land; much capital has come into the country, property of all kinds has increased in value, and millions have been saved in the administration of the government. There is a very strong party of the most intelligent natives — they are probably the majority—which favors English occupancy. They are so well satisfied with the justice and efficiency of the present government that they do not want to return to native rule. However much Colonel Roosevelt might have sympathized with the spirit of Egyptian nationalism in the abstract, he was convinced that the overthrow of the existing government would be a calamity to Egypt and the Soudan. With his characteristic frankness he had no hesitancy in saying so to those who could give the widest currency to his views through the native press. One could start trouble in Egypt with very little effort just now, for the political poise is very delicately adjusted.

I visited Egypt to make a study of the farms and fellahin. These fellahin or farmers are the sinews of the nation's strength, for practically all of Egypt's wealth is from agriculture. The fellahin are generally above medium height, their bones strong and massive, their wrists and ankles large and clumsy. In these respects the fellahin, as well as their camels and other domestic animals, contrast strongly with the desert people.

Then, there are the Egyptian agitators—men who have received some training in Moslem schools; who are too ready to make use of this dissatisfaction of the poor fellah, not for the fellah's betterment, but to fill their own purses or advance their own schemes. Without a doubt,

THE LAND OF THE FREE

OUR text is the legend inscribed on the bell that on July 4, 1776, rang out the news of the signing of the Declaration of Independence. In the preamble of that historic manifesto it is affirmed that all men are created equal and endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

But what is this boasted liberty of ours? In the light of history the question is a vitally important one. A long procession of republics has passed into oblivion from not understanding it. The worst of tyrannies and bloodiest of crimes have resulted from freedom running riot.

First, then, let it be understood that our liberty is liberty qualified by law. Not long ago an educated immigrant of good character was detained at Ellis Island and finally deported as an undesirable citizen because he was an open and avowed anarchist, which means simply that, without any regard for the constituted authorities, he expected to follow the bent of his own sweet will. For him and others like him there is no room in this free country.

I remember when a boy on the Western frontier hearing the Hutchinson family sing:

> Come along, come along, make no delay;
> Come from every nation, come from every way;
> Our land it is broad enough, don't be alarmed;
> Uncle Sam is rich enough to give you all a farm.

That sort of welcome is none too broad. The glad hand of the Republic is extended to the oppressed of all nations, to rich and poor, learned and ignorant, patricians and plebeians, all sorts and conditions of men. But this is always on one condition, a condition which involves the issues of national life or death, namely, that the newcomer shall be Americanized; that is, that he shall cast off all allegiance to other governments and submit to our laws precisely as he finds them.

It is recorded that when Romulus reached the place where he proposed to locate the capitol of his projected city, he required each of his followers to take from about his neck the little bag of earth which was preserved as a memorial of fatherland and cast it into the excavation which had been made about the consecrated spot, thus pledging exclusive and eternal loyalty to Rome. This was manifestly the part of wisdom, since patriotism can tolerate no divided allegiance.

A hyphenated American is a semi-foreigner, whose room is better than his company. We are all foreigners, at a less or greater remove, except our Indian tribes; but wherever we or our ancestors were born—in France, England, Ireland, Germany or Italy—and however warmly we may cherish the memory of that fatherland, the Republic demands and expects of each and all an undivided loyalty which expresses itself in obedience to the constituted laws of this country and of no other.

Second: Our freedom is civil, not personal freedom. A republic is founded on a social compact or covenant in which personal considerations are merged in the public welfare. It is a government not of one or of many, but of all; a government "of the people, by the people, for the people." Its watchword is pro bono publico.

If a man were alone in the island of Juan Fernandez he might throw stones toward all points of the compass with none to hinder him. That would be personal freedom. But if another man came to the island, the personal freedom of the first settler would be so far abridged that he could not throw a stone in the direction of the newcomer. And should the island presently become populous he would be estopped from throwing any stones at all. In other words his personal freedom would be supplanted by civil freedom; in which only such rights could be recognized as do not antagonize the rights of others.

The heresy of personal freedom is one which prevails extensively among those who have fled from tyranny in the old world. They have heard that America is "the land of the free"; and they expect to do as they please without reference to law and order, or to the rights of others. Any attempt to enforce the excise laws or the Sunday laws, for example, is regarded as an infringement of "personal freedom." It is, therefore, of the utmost importance that they should be advised that the only freedom in our country is social freedom; such as conduces to the social welfare or equal rights of all.

In 1794 there was a disturbance in Pennsylvania known as the Whisky Insurrection, due to the imposition of a tax on the distilling of ardent spirits. The representative of the French government in America at that time was "Citizen Genet," who persistently urged the distillers to resist the tax; whereupon Washington notified him that he was persona non grata and France was constrained to recall him. The so-called liberty of the French revolutionists was disavowed thus early in our history. We know no freedom in America except such as is consistent with public good as expressed in the sanctity of law.

Third: It is religious freedom, but not irreligion. The first amendment to our national Constitution reads thus: "Congress shall make no laws respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof."

By that enactment it was forever impossible to set up in America a State church, in which any particular sect or denomination should have special privilege. Farsighted men were these forefathers of ours! For the principle of religious equality is wholly subverted by the union of Church and State; an alliance justly characterized by O'Connell as "that foul and adulterous connection which pollutes the purity of heaven with the abomination of earth."

Ringing Out the News of Independence, Philadelphia, July 4, 1776

But the man who infers from this provision of the Constitution that ours is not a Christian country is far afield. The discoverer of America christened it San Salvador; that is, "Land of the Saviour." The men who originally settled in it were Christians of a most pronounced type, such as Puritans, Covenanters and Huguenots. The first ballot ever cast in our national history was in the cabin of the Mayflower in mid-ocean, when John Carver was elected governor of the unborn colony, the record of the transaction beginning and ending with the words: "In the name of God. Amen." The principles underlying our constitution are those set forth in the Decalogue and the Sermon on the Mount. Our laws and jurisprudence are based on the code of the Scriptures. And, to close the question, it has been repeatedly determined by formal decisions of our highest courts that this is a Christian country. No man can take issue with that judicial determination without compromising his loyalty.

But the fact referred to must be so construed as to harmonize with the utmost freedom of faith and worship. More than that, it must not contravene the right to disbelieve, to renounce all forms of worship, even to deny the being of God himself; so long as the exercise of that right on the part of the unbeliever does not interfere with the rights of other men. On the ratification of our national Constitution in 1787 a procession of 5,000 people marched through the streets of Philadelphia, led by two clergymen with a Jewish rabbi between them. This was as it should be. There are no thumb-screws in the commonwealth of God.

But the very safeguard of this freedom is the religion that underlies it. An irreligious or non-religious nation has never yet stood for religious freedom. It has been affirmed of late, in some quarters, that our toleration of every form of faith or unfaith proves that we are not a Christian country. It proves the very contrary. God himself permits a man to disbelieve, even to blaspheme his holy name; nor does he abdicate his throne, but rather strengthens his benign sovereignty in doing so. This is the sort of religious freedom that loyal Americans stand for. They hold that religion is necessary to the maintenance of the State, and that the Church is necessary to the maintenance of religion. They hold that Church and State are co-ordinate powers, mutually independent yet interdependent. The Church in America asks nothing more of the State than protection in the free exercise of its ecclesiastical rights, in return for which it pledges an unconditional loyalty to the vital principles which underlie our national life.

At the same time it concedes the right of disbelief to all; a concession in which the State concurs, providing there is nothing in this disbelief which endangers the body politic. A good deal has been said wise and otherwise, about the banishment of Roger Williams from the colony of Massachusetts by "The Great and General Court" in 1635. In justice to our Puritan forefathers it would be well to consider the ground of their much-criticised action. The "Order of Banishment," copied from the records in the State House at Boston, reads as follows:

> Whereas, Mr. Roger Williams, one of the Elders of the Church of Salem, hath broached and dyvulged dyvers new and dangerous opinions against the authoritie of Magistrates, as also with lyes of defamaccion both of the Magistrates and the Churches here, and yet mayntaineth the same without retraccion: It is therefore ordered that the said Mr. Williams shall departe out of this jurisdiccion within sixe weekes nexte ensuing, which if he neglecte to performe, it shal be lawfull for the Gouner and two Magistrates to send him to some place out of this jurisdiccion, not to returne any more without licence from the Court.

By this it appears that William was banished for disloyalty to the constituted authorities of the colony and not for taking issue with the Puritans. Thus, even in this extreme case, there was no violation of the principle of religious freedom.

The purpose of those who formulated our Constitution may be clearly seen in an address of the Convention of 1787: "If God prosper us, we shall here begin a work which shall last for ages. We shall plant here a new society in the principles of the fullest liberty and the purest religion. We shall subdue this wilderness which is before us. We shall fill this region of the great continent, which stretches almost from pole to pole, with civilization and Christianity. The temples of the true God shall rise where now ascends the smoke of idolatrous sacrifices. Fields and gardens, the flowers of summer and the waving, golden harvests of autumn shall spread over a thousand hills, and stretch along a thousand valleys, never yet, since the creation, reclaimed to the use of civilized man. We shall whiten this coast with the canvas of a prosperous commerce. We shall stud the long and winding shore with a hundred cities. From the simplicity of our social union there shall arise wise and politic constitutions of government, full of the liberty which we ourselves bring and breathe. From our zeal for learning, institutions shall spring, which shall scatter the light of knowledge throughout the land, and, in time, paying back where they have borrowed, shall contribute their part to the great aggregate of human knowledge; and our descendants throughout all generations shall look back to this spot and to this hour with unabated affection.

It thus appears that we are, beyond all doubt or peradventure, a Christian nation; and by God's grace we shall so continue to be. A few months ago I stood on the deck of an incoming vessel with others who were shading their eyes to catch sight of the home land. At length one said: "I see it—Sandy Hook, yonder—Ah, that's God's country!" And there was not one among us who did not gratefully echo in his inmost heart, "God's country!" So do we all, in our best moods and moments, pay tribute to him who hath made and preserved us a nation

His truth is marching on.

Yet a movement has been instituted some quarters to eliminate the name Christ from text books used in our ıblic schools! There are said to be)0,000 Jews in the City of New York; ıt, whatever may be their political ›wer, they would do well to think vice before assuming that the reli›ous sentiment of America has per›anently gone to sleep. The name of hrist is woven inextricably into the arp and woof of our national life. ur very calendar is in evidence. Not ng ago, in one of our public schools, e lesson of the day was on the assas›nation of Cæsar, which occurred in B.C. One of the pupils asked: Teacher, what do those letters mean?" he only answer possible was "Before hrist." But, on being further asked hat that meant, the teacher, a Jewess, as at her wits' end. A little later e lesson was on the overthrow of rusalem by Titus, which happened) A.D. "Teacher, what do these letrs mean?" Again the answer must : "In the year of our Lord." THE WHITE STONE

By Rev. J. M. Farrar, D.D.*

IT has been thirty-nine years, July 13, 1871, since the discovery of diamonds in South Africa. Do you know how these great mines were discovered? A trader stopping over night with a Dutch farmer saw the children playing with bright marbles. The trader took the white stones to Cape Town and found they were diamonds of wonderful beauty and great value. In these thirty-nine years about eleven tons of diamonds have been taken from the Kimberly mines. Think of eleven tons of diamonds, like eleven tons of coal, being dumped into your cellar.

HAVE you a diamond? If not, do you want one? "Sure!" That is the answer I expected. But I am not sure that you would be really happy if you had a dozen diamonds. Last year a little child in Jersey City had two hundred diamonds, worth a hundred thousand dollars, but they did not make him happy. You could have bought them all for a small drum and a tin horn. The father found them and not knowing their value gave them to his boy for playthings. The child threw them away. In 1727 the people of Brazil used diamonds, white stones, as counters in playing games. In Khorasan, in 1823, Abbas Mirza purchased for a trifle a 132-carat diamond from a peasant who was using it as a flint for striking fire. You would enjoy a diamond, but it would not make you really happy. Why? Because there is something making you unhappy that these diamonds cannot take away. The Diamond Company of South Africa has a large room literally heaped with diamonds that looks like an Arabian Nights vision. But if you had all these and all the other diamonds in the world you could not purchase forgiveness of your sins.

YOUR text says the sin of Judah was written with a pen of iron and with the point of a diamond. It is sin that makes you unhappy. Sin can be written with a diamond, but it cannot be taken away with a diamond. The text means that just as the old engravers used a pencil of iron with a diamond point for writing messages that were to endure, so God wrote the sin of the sinners. Did you hear where they were written? Written on their hearts. Does this mean that the Juniors have records of their sins written on their own hearts? Then each Junior is a page in God's book of remembrance. What a wonderful book! Ask your father to tell you about the loose leaf books and ledgers. The page that can be put in or taken out without destroying the book. Every time you see a diamond just think of one in the point of an iron pen writing the sins on the heart of the sinners.

IS there no way to get the record of sin taken off your heart? The story of another white stone will answer your question. God so loved us that he sent his son to purchase with his own life the forgiveness of our sins. Christ takes the sin leaf out of your heart book and nails it to his cross. Ask mother to tell you all about it. When your sins are forgiven and you fight against sin and conquer, God says he will give you "a white stone, and in the stone a new name written." See Rev. 2: 17. This white stone with the new name will make you happy. The only white stone that can make any one really happy. This White Stone was discovered on Calvary twenty centuries ago.

YOU want me to tell you a diamond story? You shall have it, if I can tell one that will help you to remember the sermon.

The day's work at the mine was over and Frederick Wells, the surface manager, was making his usual rounds. Glancing along one side of the deep excavation his eye suddenly caught the gleam of a brilliant object far up the bank. He lost no time in climbing up to the spot where he had noted the glint of light. He had not been mistaken: it was a brilliant crystal. He tried to pull it out with his fingers, and as this proved impossible he sought to pry it out with the blade of his pen-knife. To his surprise the blade of the knife broke without causing the stone to yield. Then he knew it was a large stone. So large and brilliant was the stone that he feared he was either dreaming or was insane.

DETERMINED to test the stone on the spot, before proceeding further, Wells rubbed off the dirt from one of its faces with his fingers, and soon convinced himself that it was not a lump of glass, but a diamond, apparently of exceptional whiteness and purity. He finally succeeded in prying out the stone and bore it away with him to the office of the mine. Here it was cleaned and, to the astonishment of all, was found to have a weight of 302¾ carats, more than three times that of any other diamond that had been discovered. Before many hours passed the telegraph carried tidings to all parts of the world that the greatest diamond of this age or any other age had been brought to light. T. M. Cullinan, founder and chairman of the Premier Company, named the diamond after himself; others have called it the Premier and several different names have been proposed. It was purchased and presented to King Edward VII. He has passed to a country to which he could not take this almost priceless white stone. When dying he said: "It is all over, but I think I have done my duty." We all hope he had the "white stone with the new name," the only white stone he could take with him beyond his palace in London.

Women Differ on the Suffrage

THE following letters from readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD deal with both sides of the suffrage question and are given as illustrating the conflict of opinion on the subject:

The Harm of Equal Suffrage

Why should the women of America seek equal rights with men, when they already have them? Women will have a right to vote in any State whenever the womanly women want it. But they do not want it.

The best argument against woman suffrage is the harm to which it might lead. If women assume the business of men, then who will do the homemaking? Milton, in his grand Paradise Lost, portrays the folly of woman in leaving her place of dependence. If she takes her place in the ranks of men in the great battle of life, then where is man's glory and honor?

Henry, Va. MRS. F. M. G.

Responsibility Broadens

The responsibility of a vote is supposed to develop and broaden men of low mentality. We know hundreds of dissipated, weak men, who are supported by others all their lives; but they are allowed to vote just the same. Should we apply the same tests to women voters that are applied to men voters? Almost every law in a republic affects either a woman or her young children, and she should be allowed to vote on it. SUBSCRIBER.

Plainville, N. Y.

Womanly Women Do Not Want It

The womanly woman is contented and happy to attend to her home duties and bring up her sons and daughters properly. Can we not trust our sons and husbands to govern our political affairs? The family of the political woman will be reared by servants; her husband and sons will frequent the saloons and lose all regard for women. A. E. B.

Stuart, Ia.

Is This a Free Country?

We are often told that this is a free country; but no country is free in which all have not the same rights. So long as even a few women cannot vote, those women are not free. All should be free to vote. They need not use their freedom unless they wish to. Also, we are told this is a government "by the people," and many lament that it has been so unsuccessful. In Europe, it is felt that we are a failure; but women are people. Even the bitterest "anti" will acknowledge that. We have so far had government only by half the people. H. L. S.

Milwaukee, Wis.

Man's Superior

As long as woman remains away from the polls, she is man's superior. As soon as she votes, they become equal. MRS. DR. P.

Miamisburg, O.

Only the Good Should Vote

I belong to the W. C. T. U., a noble band of women, but we are forgetting the main issue when we clamor for the vote. It seems to be taken for granted that only good women would vote. One of your readers (O. Y.) has put it plainly why women should not vote; but I foresee trouble in enforcing such a law as she desires. J. H. K.

W. Hartford, Conn.

Overthrow Evildoers

In the awful conflict between light and darkness, constantly going on in our government, woman should have a voice. It would be on the side of light in nearly every case. The keepers of saloons and all evil places are said to be a unit against woman suffrage. They know women would overthrow all evildoers. A READER.

THE BRILLIANT ROOSEVELT WEDDING

FEW weddings of recent years were of such interest to the public at large as that of young Theodore Roosevelt, Jr., to Miss Eleanor Butler Alexander, which occurred in New York on the afternoon of June 20. On account of the prominence of the young people, the event was considered almost as a national event, and besides in June people are more interested in weddings than anything else, with graduations a close second. Colonel and Mrs. Roosevelt hurried home from Europe to attend the ceremony, landing two days before. The wonderful reception accorded the ex-President, coming so close to the wedding day, gave the latter added importance in the eyes of the public, and a large crowd gathered about the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church and along Fifth Avenue in the hope of catching a glimpse of the bride and groom, and also of Colonel Roosevelt and the distinguished guests. A small group also gathered in front of the bride's home. A large force of police was detailed to keep the crowd in order, but this was found to be unnecessary. All respected the occasion, and there were none of the scenes which have marred some large weddings in the past.

The church interior ordinarily is rather plain, but for this day the decorators had wrought wonders and converted it into a bower of flowers. Along the aisles were white roses and lilies of the valley caught in clusters at the end of the pews. Roses, peonies and lilies were banked about the pulpit. Back of the platform there rose a high screen of roses and lilies, and a row of palms lifted their green crests as high as the top of the organ. This floral screen concealed the famous orchestra of Nathan Franko, which played an elaborate programme of special music while the guests were being seated. The ushers for the most part were Harvard friends of the groom, and they had much to do, as about 2,000 people had to be seated before the bridal party entered the church door.

Among the guests were Rear-Admiral and Mrs. Cowles, Mayor and Mrs. Gaynor, the Secretary of the Navy, Senator Lodge, Dr. Lyman Abbott, Senator Depew, Mr. Gifford Pinchot, Mrs. Russell Sage, and many others well known for their social or political prominence. Mrs. Julia Ward Howe came all the way from Boston to be present, and seemed greatly to enjoy the ceremony and the reception which followed.

The Roosevelt family arrived in a large automobile, and there was a ripple of applause until the Colonel lifted his hat in acknowledgment of the greeting. He then hastened into the church. Throughout the day he tried to remain in the background and let the bride and groom have all the glory of the happy occasion.

Mr. and Mrs. Theodore Roosevelt Leaving the Church

Among the guests were fifty members of the Rough Riders Association, who were holding their reunion in New York, having come East to take part in the Roosevelt parade two days before. They came to the church as the special guests of their former leader. They were in their famous khaki uniform and attracted much attention as they marched down two and two from the Hotel Buckingham.

A squad of mounted police made way for the six automobiles containing the bridesmaids, while others accompanied the limousine which took the bride by a shorter route to the church.

Miss Ethel Roosevelt was one of the bridesmaids and Kermit Roosevelt, still showing the tan of the African sun, acted as his brother's best man. The bridesmaids wore gowns of white chiffon. The fronts had panels painted with white and blue flowers. These came from Paris. They wore white hats trimmed with pink roses, and each carried a bouquet of pink roses on her arm. The matron of honor, Mrs. Fahnestock, was a young lady for whom Miss Alexander had acted as maid of honor several weeks before. She wore her wedding gown.

The bride wore a gown of white satin trimmed with rare duchesse point lace, and the veil was held in place by a fillet of orange blossoms, without which no bridal attire seems complete. With the first notes of the March from Lohengrin the procession moved down the aisle. First came the ushers, then the bridesmaids, the maid of honor, and then the bride leaning on her mother's arm. Her only jewels were a string of pearls. Her bouquet of roses, orchids and orange blossoms was arranged in a shower effect. The ceremony was performed by the Rev. Henry M. Sanders, the great-uncle of the bride, and Rev. Dr. Gordon Russell, of Cranford, N. J. During the ceremony the orchestra played softly Schumann's Evening Songs. At the close of the wedding service the bride and groom knelt on a white satin priedieu, trimmed with roses and lilies of the valley, for the benediction.

The bride and groom, after the recessional, jumped into their automobile, and whirled away almost before the crowd caught sight of them. Then they got a hearty cheer. Colonel Roosevelt also received a cheer when he appeared from the church, and again he had to lift his hat.

The reception was held at the home of the bride's uncle, who has one of the most beautiful houses in New York. It was after six when the bride and groom, dressed in traveling costume, came running down the steps to their motor, to start on their wedding journey. Before they reached their car however, they were showered with roses by the bridesmaids and ushers.

The young couple will make their home in San Francisco where Mr. Roosevelt will act as Western manager for the carpet works in which he was employed for two years in Connecticut. Among the gifts was a handsome clock from the workmen of the mills near Hartford, where Mr. Roosevelt was very popular.

Guests Arriving at the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church

A View of the "Bread Line"

IN a recent issue of the New York Observer, Walter Graham gives his impressions of the "Bread Line" of the Bowery Mission. He vividly pictures the "Line" in operation. It is not, as many suppose, a line of human wrecks all showing the earmarks of direst want, but

A company of citizens seventy-five per cent. of whom, apparently, are hale, strong and vigorous, and denoting an age-limit not exceeding fifty years at farthest; the remainder, also, if, indeed, betraying gray hairs aplenty, yet lacking a single example of decrepitude or the external indications of disease. And with respect to the matter of clothing, look as sharply as he may he will fail to detect a solitary example of the scarecrow order—no approach to a case that if seen in the street would lead the most morbidly critical to turn round to look at; while, on the other hand, if he is in want of a clerk for his office or a handy man about his house, he need not wipe his spectacles in order to discover a full score of tidily attired, spruce-linened, comfortably shod, clean-shaven individuals from whom—supposing, of course, other requirements met—to make a prompt and desirable selection. He might note, however, I may interject, a very general, though by no means universal, tell-tale omission in the dress equipment of both the well and fairly clad and the shabbily habited alike—the absence of an overcoat; proclaiming the melancholy truth that when poverty has an unrelenting throathold of its victim even so essential an article of winter apparel has to be surrendered as too costly a luxury.

In fact, this considerable element of respectability characterizing the midnight exhibit, combined with the large proportion of youthful and sub-youthful vigor in evidence, are twin surprises which, on the surface at any rate, form its most appalling features. That so numerous a body of well-appearing men, seemingly so well fitted, physically and mentally, for performing some useful and self-sustaining function of citizenship, should, by any coalition of unfavorable circumstances, be idle and, temporarily at least, presumably homeless, was, in sooth, a staggering revelation.

The writer talked with some of the men and the keynote of every conversation was work—jobs held or lost, jobs looked for and jobs promised soon. Idleness was an incidental and temporary condition. He noticed, too, that on Saturday nights the Line was smallest, the more fortunate men having probably succeeded on that day in getting something for maintenance. He considers that the Bread Line is not a charity that would invite the non-needy. "No sane man," he writes in conclusion, "would stay up till 1 o'clock on a winter morning or get out of bed at that hour in order to fill up on free hot coffee." As to the means for supplying this midnight refreshment to the homeless and unemployed, he believes that the wealthy men of New York, if they knew the facts, would be quick to supply all that was needed to carry out the benevolence of the Bowery Mission Bread Line.

Cheering the Missionary

MRS. G. B. CARPENTER of Ping Loh, South China, sends this most appreciative letter:

"We are in receipt of the 'Dreamland Calendar' and Hero Tales. To say that they are all and much more than we had anticipated, is only putting the truth mildly. The calendar is truly a work of art and beauty, and will not only be an ornament to our missionary home here in inland China, but a source of blessing and inspiration. I cannot tell you how much I enjoyed it. It reminds me very much of our own little darling, who, I fancy, is about the same age, and hence it is doubly precious to us. One can almost see the little dear open her big bright eyes and smile into your face! Such purity, innocence, rest and peace are depicted on the sweet little face that it brings a feeling of rest and relief to look at it. And the dear little dimpled hands tempt one to clasp them! Truly, 'tis as though one were gazing upon the little dear herself! The Hero Tales, too, will afford many a pleasant and profitable hour. We have already become acquainted with many new heroes—new to us—and many old acquaintances have been renewed to our profit and pleasure. Best of all, because it is a constant visitor, is the dear CHRISTIAN HERALD. I cannot express the pleasure and benefit this is to us each time it comes, keeping us in touch with the whole wide world, and informing us of the most interesting occurrences. Many, many thanks to you for all. We don't see how you can give us so much for only $2. You have the sincere prayers for continued blessing and success upon all your efforts and labor for Him, from both my husband and self."

Help by "Christian Herald"

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD suits us very well. The first we look at is the Sunday School Lesson, and we hope you will make it spiritual and plain. Wife teaches a class of large boys and spiritual help is needed. I teach an adult class of men and women, age from forty up, and we look to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to help us. Hope you will not fail to denounce sin, though it be in high places.

BRAVE CORINNA SHATTUCK DEAD

She Was the Christian Heroine of Oorfa, During the Terrible "Massacre Days" of 1896

Machine Shop, Oorfa Mission

The American Mission Compound, Oorfa

Cabinet Shop, Oorfa Mission

FEW American missionaries in foreign lands were better known—by name at least—or more widely honored than Corinna Shattuck, who passed away recently at Grove Hall, Dorchester, Mass. By the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Miss Shattuck was especially beloved, for many of them have had a warm personal interest in her work in Asiatic Turkey for the last fourteen years. There is a wonderful story of missionary devotion and Christian heroism in the career of this gentle and unassuming woman, who has now ceased from her labors. She consecrated her life to the cause of missions when she was a young girl. Her first field was Aintab, Turkey, in 1873. She was not robust and after six years of work was sent to Colorado to recuperate. She was back again in 1883, fairly restored, and became principal of a Girls' School at Marash. Nine years later, she engaged in evangelistic and educational work at Oorfa, and this was her post when the series of frightful outbreaks occurred against the Armenians throughout the whole of Asiatic Turkey.

Corinna Shattuck

Miss Shattuck's experience in Oorfa at that time has been variously represented, few of the published accounts, however, being accurate. A brief narrative of the tragedy of Oorfa and the part Miss Shattuck and her missionary associates took in protecting the defenseless Armenians was printed in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD shortly after the event. We have now received, through the courtesy of Miss Myra A. Proctor of Stoneham, Mass., Miss Shattuck's own story of the Oorfa massacres, written January 24, 1896, in which she tells, with characteristic modesty, what actually happened. Her letter (which is addressed to a cousin in Littleton, Mass.) says:

A paper was forced upon the Christians for signature stating that there was complete quiet and harmony in the city, and with profuse expressions of gratitude to officers, etc. This was sent to the Sultan—a clause confessing the cause of the disorder as some disorderly Armenians, and expressing regrets. They changed it before signing, and it queerly was not noticed and the telegram was sent! It cost the Christians over $20. They were told if they refused they would be considered "rebels." Our pastor signed for Protestants; in all, there were some twenty-five signatures of prominent men.

The Moslems became more and more restless as news came in from round about, saying: "What have we done, where is the show of our faith (religion)?" We expected a second uprising; yet at the last it came with great suddenness. Saturday morning, December 28, one hour after the long-waited-for permit to leave for Aintab had been granted me by our Pasha, the dire work began which continued till Sunday night. Innumerable crowds of Moslem residents, joined by Kurds from villages and assisted on every side by the soldiers, went about entering the homes, ferreting out the hidden men and butchering them like so many sheep. Women and children were untouched, except where they tried to protect the men. A little after, the women and children were removed from the homes by soldiers and taken in crowds to khan, mosque, or some Moslem home as temporary guests, while the third act was being enacted, namely, robbing the houses of everything, even the doors and window-shutters. While this work was going on about our home, we were carefully protected, military officials frequently sent me salaams and implored that I "be not disturbed." Neighbors rushed in pell mell over the walls, our guards shouting that they must not come. The servant tried to keep them out, but it was impossible, and by Saturday night I found we had two hundred and forty. They were everywhere—in my private rooms, kitchen, stable, etc.—anywhere to be under my shadow. Poor things! What was I to do? I slept none that night. I devised a plan, submitted it to a few reliable men, persuaded, entreated, etc., and after presenting the matter, it was four and a half hours before I had all the men off my premises, but hidden, and under lock, the key being with myself. Water and bread were fed them for the next twenty-four hours. It was a heavy responsibility, but less risk than to retain them in my home. How they did plead and how firm I had to be with them! Sunday, in the early afternoon, martial music was heard and in triumphal strain. It proved a grand procession of military and civil officers and private Moslems of wealth and position viewing the streets and homes. They requested entrance to our yard and that I appear on the veranda. They expressed salaams and "begged I would not be disturbed; the proceedings did not pertain to me; I was in perfect safety." I subsided as soon as possible. They peered into windows and inquired if we had men here. Servant and guards honestly said: "No, only women and children." Was I not thankful I had hidden elsewhere the sixty men?

All day we had the smell of burning wool and cotton, bedding, etc., in the homes fired (buildings are of stone and so cannot be burned). Later, the indescribable, sickening odors from the great holocaust in the Gregorian Church, where some three thousand, having gone there Saturday night for refuge, perished. Monday the work was declared done. The Kurds and Arabs about the city were driven off by the soldiers and everywhere announcements were made that people were safe. Slowly they began to come out of their hiding-places; wells, vaults, drains, and all imaginable and unimaginable places. Some coming to me, Tuesday, had not tasted food since Saturday. They looked like corpses. Meanwhile, the authorities were dragging off the dead and burying them outside the city in long trenches. Fifteen hundred were so buried. Four days the line of Jews was seen on the brow of the hill just back of our house, lugging in sacks the bones, ashes, etc., from the church. Last of all came the clearing of wells. Some estimate that five hundred were taken out. Many wells and cisterns are very large. I know of one from which twenty-five bodies were taken. In all, our dead number five thousand, as nearly as can be estimated. Our Protestant loss, one hundred and ten. The wounded under the care of the government physician, the only doctor left, were three hundred and fifty. Many of these died. We had twenty-two here under our care, our rooms and schoolrooms being filled with the most forlorn and helpless.

Miss Shattuck lived for many years in Oorfa after these horrors and did the great work of her life there—a work which was missionary in the highest sense and which included extensive industries that developed in a most wonderful way under her careful and far-seeing management. Her life brought blessing to thousands of poor Armenians; and many of our readers, who had the pleasure of helping her in her various benevolent enterprises, found true satisfaction in being so privileged. A life so simple, so self-sacrificing and so wholly devoted to others deserves to be long remembered.

Egypt has many very dangerous men of this class. They have some education, but no wisdom, or principle, and no unselfish desire to better their countrymen. The low standard of honesty and manhood among the educated and wealthy natives is the main cause of the dissatisfaction among the peasants. In talking with English officers and English and French business men of Cairo, I named over a dozen or more wealthy, influential sheiks I had become acquainted with, and spoke of some things they had told me. These officers and business men said my native acquaintances and most other sheiks were untrustworthy. Their word was unreliable, and they could not be depended on to pay their just obligations. Their cupidity was so great that they took every opportunity to extort every piastre possible from their miserable fellah tenants, and most of their methods were grossly dishonest and oppressive. English rule is correcting these wrongs. What Egypt needs is not a written constitution, but a higher standard of manhood among the natives.

An Inward Accuser

CHARLTON, the murderer, fleeing from the scene of his crime, across the Atlantic, yet pursued and smitten at every step by an accusing conscience, is a dramatic illustration of the terrible punishment that comes to the offender who thinks to escape. It was DeQuincey who likened conscience to the Whispering Gallery in St. Paul's, London. A word spoken ever so softly on one side of the vast dome is loudly re-echoed on the other. In youth, conscience chid him in sullen whispers; in old age, at the other end of his life-gallery, the same conscience spoke to him in peals of thunder. The still small voice which the boy would not hear, returned to the old man like the crack of doom, in terrible self-reproaches. The infidel Lord Lyttleton was sometimes so frightened that he would rush into the bedroom of a friend in order that in his company he might be shielded from the terrors of the spirit world. At last he had to forsake his splendid mansion because it was too near the grave of one he had ruined. Even Nero, the monster, had to fly from the spot where he had caused his mother to be murdered. He fancied he was haunted by her angry ghost; that he heard the blowing of a ghostly trumpet, and wailings over her tomb. What a terrible discoverer of sin conscience is!

Is the Aerial Stage at Hand?

WHILE aviators here and abroad have been making records for high, low and long flying, and have done some wonderful things, that brainy old German scientist, Count Zeppelin, has fairly won the distinguished honor of being the first to introduce a regular aerial passenger service. His successful flight from Friedrichshafen to Duesseldorf makes him the pioneer in aerial railroading. It was made per schedule, and along the 300-mile route his twenty passengers could note the towns and villages below them at the exact hour stated on the Count's time-table. He has made a thorough study of aerial currents and highways of travel and his success will doubtless stimulate others to practical efforts in the same direction. "Darius Green and his Flying Machine," which was a popular recitation a generation or two ago, has been surpassed by the "bird-men" of to-day. Whether dirigible or aeroplane be the vehicle of the future matters little, for the initial difficulties have been conquered and the upper regions will soon become the field of a host of experimenters, who have already done so many wonderful things that we need not be astonished some day to hear of the establishment of aerial stage lines in many places. But let us not forget that the red cockade of triumph belongs to the grand old "bird man" of Lake Constance.

The Nation's Drink Bill

THAT reliable authority, the American Grocer, has compiled some very instructive statistics showing the production and consumption of liquor in the United States during the last two years. It is a showing that should be gratifying to every one who is opposed to the drink traffic, as it shows a reduction in the total spent for alcoholic beverages of all kinds during that period of $110,185,600. In 1907, the total expended on liquors was $1,664,-191,463 as against $1,554,005,863 last year. During the same period, population increased about 2,750,-000. The per capita consumption of spirits in 1909 was the smallest in any year of the decade, and that of beer the smallest in five years. On the other hand, the use of tea, coffee and cocoa has increased in proportion as strong drink has decreased. In 1908 there was noted a reduction of something like half a gallon per capita in consumption; in 1909 there is a further decline of 1.17 gallons. Beer and distilled spirits both shared in this decline. Thus, the whole situation logically points to the fact that these changes are the result of the general temperance wave which has spread over the country and whose principal object of attack was the saloon. It has been a successful campaign of moral education. We have a long road yet to travel, however, for the United States Treasury last year derived from all liquors approximately $199,069,684—a fabulous amount to come, in an enlightened nation, from the one thing which, above all others, is the worst foe of health, morals, and good government, and the strongest ally of crime, poverty and suffering, and premature death. By and by, as we grow more civilized and sensible, this strange anomaly of a nation deriving revenue from its own degradation will disappear. We protect our saloons, although we know that they are simply drunkard factories, where the finished article is turned out by tens of thousands yearly—where our young men, the flower of American youth, are officially sacrificed that the public treasury may be kept well filled. Our decreasing Drink Bill affords a gleam of hope that some day we may come to regard these young lives as our most precious asset. We spend seven millions yearly to find out the best methods of raising and protecting our cattle, sheep and hogs; but not one dollar to protect our youth from the drink Moloch, which thrives and flourishes and drags down its victims unhindered, wrecking homes, breaking hearts, blasting lives and bringing crime, sorrow, poverty and desolation into almost every community in the land.

Roosevelt's Future

HE is home again from his 30,000-mile journey, and he has been given a welcome such as no other living American has ever received. It was a greeting that demonstrated his overshadowing popularity. And now that it is all over and the outburst of popular enthusiasm has spent its force, there comes up in the popular mind the irrepressible question: What of Roosevelt's future? We know that in even mentioning this our motive may be misconstrued. But ours is the position of an unbiased, non-partisan observer—an interpreter of events, giving to the actors in the great drama of life the passing notice to which their parts entitle them and no more. Now, here is Mr. Roosevelt, in the prime of a very energetic life, the most loudly bepraised, the most savagely criticised man on this continent. He has already been civic official, governor, naval official, soldier, vice-president, president. What is to be the next evolution? Our contemporary the World's Work, has striven to throw some light on this puzzling question by the popular expedient of a poll of its readers. The replies recognize Roosevelt as a great moral force in the nation and as especially representing honest politics, and the "square deal." Some would have him again at the head of national affairs; others suggest for him a United States senatorship, the speakership of the House, head of the Panama Canal enterprise, governor of his own State, chairman of the Inter-State Commerce Commission, mayor of New York, and so on. A few believe he could best serve the people as a writer and editor. We do not believe Mr. Roosevelt desires the presidency again. He was seven years in the White House and all the traditions of the nation oppose a third term or its equivalent. Indeed, it is not clear that he aspires to any office. He seems to have broadened beyond mere partisanship. A potential quantity, capable of much good through his love of honesty and fair play, he might be equally capable of harm, if headstrong in the face of opposition. We could imagine him as a strong, controlling force in a World's Peace and Arbitration Tribunal, dealing with problems to which he has already given much thought and representing this republic with a dignity and acceptability such as few other men possess. In such a post he might render worthy service not alone to the nation, but in advancing the cause of international peace and friendship throughout the world.

The Deadly House-Fly

IN recent years science has told us much that is new and startling about the house-fly—musca domestica—and its deadly functions as a disease-carrier. In the current number of the National Geographic Magazine, a writer gives some further details concerning this familiar pest, which are especially timely at this season. It has been satisfactorily demonstrated that there are many diseases whose annual increase or decrease harmonize with the abundance or scarcity of flies. Their powers of locomotion enable them to carry infection long distances. It has peculiar facilities for scattering disease germs far and wide. It does this partly by means of its feet, which are fitted with pads to which particles of foreign matter adhere, and these the insect is constantly clearing off. But the greatest danger lies in the fly-specks or excreta, which are so frequent and abundant and so loaded with spores of microbes that they are a dangerous menace to health and life. Every housewife who values comfort and freedom from sickness in the home should make a systematic warfare on this tiny yet powerful enemy. It is well to begin the campaign early in the summer before the flies get a lodgment for once established, even in a single house, they are difficult to overcome.

The Lessening Dangers of the Sea

IT is but a few decades ago when a person who had been to Europe was looked upon as one who had taken his life in his hands when he braved the dangers of the deep. Many a person of wealth who longed to see the treasures of the Old World gave up that pleasure for fear of shipwreck, or the discomforts of the Atlantic voyage, and people yet living can remember when prayers were said in the churches for those about to sail for Europe. How different things are at present is shown by the fact that wrecks are now few and far between. The larger ships are as safe and steady as hotels on shore. The ships of the size of the Lusitania and Mauretania pitch but little and the most timid passengers feel safe on board. Now the Cunard Line is to build an even larger vessel, inaugurating a new class for trans-oceanic passenger traffic as the British Dreadnought did for warships. Aside from the increasing size of the ocean greyhounds, the feeling of safety on board is due to the invention of the wireless, which in several recent instances has brought help in time to save passengers on sinking ships. The United States government, realizing its importance, will in the future see that all vessels carrying over fifty passengers are provided with wireless. A bill to that effect has passed both the House and Senate and will go into effect on July 1, 1911. The wireless has killed the isolation which used to strike so many with dread when they found themselves out of sight of land and apparently at the mercy of the elements for a week or more. Perhaps some day we will get the talked-of railroad across Behring Strait, but until then the traveler to Europe has little to worry him.

—THESE ARE THE days when sweltering humanity is everywhere trying to keep cool. The state of mind largely governs that of the body and they are wisest who try just to keep calm and unruffled and to accept the weather as it comes, always taking the optimistic view of things, and eating, exercising and dressing in moderation. "The doctors tell me," wrote a distinguished cleric, "that I have some seven different ailments, most of them very deadly; but by trusting in God, living frugally and taking all things as they come from his hand, I am in all other respects enjoying very fair health."

The Rubber Gatherers

PEOPLE enjoying the arts of civilized life do not generally realize at what a fearful expense of health and happiness their necessaries and luxuries have been secured. Men dashing along the highways in their automobiles and other rubber-tired conveyances little conceive how much sweat and blood are mixed up with the rubber that is used in the various industries in these modern times. The story of the rubber industry of the Congo has been the sensation and scandal of modern times. The poor natives that originally owned the forest are having a terrible time in making the trees keep up with the demands of our age and the cruel greed of the human heart. Such large quantities of juice are required from each workman, so many hours of labor are demanded, so little pay is allowed, such harsh treatment is received, that life has become a disappointment and misery to a majority of the native workmen and families of the Congo; and added to the perils we have mentioned there is that of the head-hunters who creep upon the workmen unawares, cut off their heads and eat their bodies. Some of the more vigorous peoples organize themselves against and defeat these cannibals. In the Congo one of the most industrious peoples are the Batetela. In gathering rubber they go into the forests inhabited by the Baukutu head-hunting cannibals. While the men are in the forest, the camp is guarded by a man who surveys the surroundings from a scaffold, and by a drummer. When the Baukutu are seen to approach, the drummer beats the alarm and all the men return to the camp to fight. The weapons used are the spear, shield, bow and arrow. This sentinel earns in the neighborhood of $100 of our money a year, which enables him to buy a wife. Men are crazy with their gambling in rubber in London. We may catch the craze in America. The bubble seems at the point of bursting, and a widespread panic and suffering will result. The price of rubber has advanced enormously, but the poor men in the forests who furnish the product get no benefit of the advance. Fortunately there is a concerted determination to end the atrocities of the Congo rubber industry, and there ought to be a prayer of universal Christianity for God's help in protecting his own oppressed children and in confounding their enemies. The Psalmist uses words which voice the deep desire of these poor native hearts.

Plead my cause, O Lord, with them that strive with me: fight against them that fight against me. Take hold of shield and buckler, and stand up for mine help. Draw out also the spear, and stop the way against them that persecute me. (Ps. 35:1, 3.)

Show Faith by Works

President Arthur T. Hadley, in his baccalaureate address at Yale the other day, really preached a sermon on faith —faith in man, faith in society, faith in the truths of nature, and faith in God. At the close of his address he made this eloquent reference to the necessity of works as well as faith: "You call your God the God of justice; see to it that your faith takes such shape that you could worship him only by doing justice. You call your God the God of love; see that your faith is so shaped as to make you give love instead of merely trying to receive it. You call him the God of battles—and this is perhaps, in a real masculine faith, the highest title of all. See that your trust in him is an inspiration to you to take your part in the battles both with courage and with intelligence." This wholesome advice could be profitably repreached and accepted by every minister in the land.

For as the body without the spirit is dead, so faith without works is dead also. (James 2:26.)

Sharks Waited for Them

The George A. McFadden, a four-masted schooner, loaded with lumber, went to pieces on Diamond Shoal, off Cape Hatteras, not long ago, and the crew of nine men, clinging to the ringbolts of the frail top of a deckhouse for a day, with the waves pounding them, drifted out to sea. After a fearful night the first light of the morning disclosed a school of big man-eating sharks swimming alongside the raft, waiting for the men to fall into the sea and furnish them an early breakfast. Fortunately, the men were rescued by the Cathedrine, a British tramp, and were afterward transferred to the United States gunboat Paducah, and thus saved from an awful death. There are storms and shoals, and sharks and shipwrecks, on the sea of life. The good ship of Zion is at hand to rescue. What would have been thought of this crew if it had refused the rescue that was offered? And yet there are many who, in the spiritual realm, neglect, or reject, the means offered for their escape, and perish in the sea. Paul in his letter to Timothy refers to such as he cautions him to constancy:

Holding faith, and a good conscience; which some having put away, concerning faith have made shipwreck. (I. Tim. 1:19.)

A Beautiful Sign

Mr. Everett Shinn, an oil painter and mural decorator, who exhibits in the Academy of Design, read of an address made by a fellow-artist in Washington, claiming that commercialism was ruining art, and determined that he would give a practical illustration of the fact that such an opinion was a mistaken one. He made a contract with a firm of architects, whose office was near Broadway and Fortieth Street, New York, for painting a sign, which should be placed in front of the building which they occupied. He used two sheets of brass thirty-five inches long and twenty-two inches broad for his purpose, and has about completed a beautiful picture showing a marquis in the garb of Louis XVI., coat of crimson silk, yellow silk stockings and lace-trimmed sleeves, inspecting a large sheet of plans which is held up by an architect in somewhat plainer attire. Near the nobleman and looking over his shoulder is a beautiful woman in ornate costume. It is to have a carved frame with flowers at the bottom and garlands of toned-down fruit spun all around it. There will be grillwork and it will be on a standard so that the effect can be had going and coming. This painter says that there is too much talk of art for art's sake, and that there ought to be just as much of the beautiful as possible woven into the practical affairs of every-day life. It is evident that the finest art has not been able to eliminate commercialism from its realm, when it is remembered what enormous amounts of money are necessary to procure the masterpieces. While the art critics can entertain themselves with the question as to how far art should be patronized for art's sake, the general public will certainly hail the wider exhibit of beautiful pieces of art than that afforded in the secluded art galleries. In the building of the temple the Almighty arranged it so that the practical and substantial parts of the building were exquisitely decorated. There is the best ideal of human life where the temple of the soul has substantial supports, decorated with the most exquisite beauty, where the prose and poetry of life are both found in proper proportions. This thought is symbolized in the selection of Hiram, the artist in brass, to decorate the pillars in the temple porch.

And he made two chapiters of molten brass, to set upon the tops of the pillars; and nets of checker work, and wreaths of chain work, for the chapiters which were upon the top of the pillars; and he made the pillars, and two rows round about them, the one network to cover the chapiters upon the top with pomegranates, and the chapiters that were on the top of the pillars were of lily work in the porch. (I. Kings 7:16, 19.)

An Alarm of "Headhunters" in an African Rubber Camp

Recommends Death to Idiots

Dr. David O. Hudson, of Montgomery City, Mo., has stirred the medical world, and made quite a sensation in the country, by advocating the doctrine of exterminating all idiots in the almshouses throughout the land. In replying to his critics he says: "I do not go so far as to recommend condemning to death the aged, but I see no reason why this class of insane people, after being passed upon by a properly constituted commission, should not mercifully be put to sleep forever. The class I refer to are bereft of all human instinct, mere animals. I would not do this for mercenary purposes, nor to relieve society of its responsibility, but purely as a mercy to this class of sufferers." This proposition is heathenism pure and simple. In olden times among the most civilized people they put old men and women to death, killed the babies that were deformed or weak, and counted human life a comparatively trifling thing. The disregard of human life in this country is bad enough without setting out deliberately to murder the unfortunates whom God has entrusted to our care. What a stain would be upon the skirts of a society that would chloroform the aged and insane and thus destroy innocent lives which God alone has the right to take! To such the words of the prophet would have special application:

In thy skirts is found the blood of the souls of the poor innocents. (Jer. 2:34.)

Christian Unity

In this time of united effort for the salvation of the world in our generation, the letter of Theodore Roosevelt to the World's Missionary Conference in Edinburgh will be of great value. The half of the letter referring to Christian unity is as follows: "In missionary work, above all other kinds of Christian work, it is imperative to remember that a divided Christendom can only imperfectly bear witness to the essential unity of Christianity. I believe that without compromise of belief, without loss of the positive good contained in the recognition of the great diversities of gifts and the differences of administration, the Christian churches may yet find a way to cordial co-operation and friendship as regards the great underlying essentials upon which, as a foundation, all Christian churches are built. This is one of the lessons which have been particularly impressed upon me by what I have seen of Christian work in Africa, both in heathen and Mohammedan lands. I believe that unity in a spirit of Christian brotherhood for such broad Christian work will tend, not to do away with differences of doctrine, but to prevent us from laying too much stress on these differences of doctrine. It is written in the Scriptures that 'he that doeth my will shall know of the doctrine,' but the reverse of this proposition can not be found in Holy Writ. Emphasis is to be put upon 'doing the will.' If only we can make up our minds to work together with earnest sincerity for the common good we shall find that doctrinal differences in no way interfere with our doing this work." The importance of Christian unity as an instrument of the world's redemption is recognized in the prayer of our Lord:

That they all may be one; as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us; that the world may believe that thou hast sent me. (John 17:21.)

ONE "FOURTH" AT MONT-LAWN

By ELEANOR H. PORTER

Author of "Into Still Waters," "The Story of Marco," etc.

THE Fourth at Mont-Lawn sometimes begins days earlier—and in New York at that. If you don't believe it, come with me on the second of July to a little room away at the top of the Bible House. You won't doubt it then, for "The Fourth" shines in sixty eager little faces, and drops from twice as many joyous little lips, while the children wait for the order to start.

Down in the street a little later we board the special car with the children. We attract a good deal of attention, and we fear we are a little too noisy perhaps. Then, with a shout and a cheer, and a clang of the bell, we are off.

At the Grand Central we find another special car waiting to take us to Tarrytown, and we hasten aboard. You think, perhaps, that you have taken a railroad journey before; but you decide now that you haven't, for never until now have you taken one with sixty thin-faced, wide-eyed children whose playground has been the city streets, and whose horizon has been the tenement-house roof across the alley.

At Tarrytown we take the ferry for Nyack, and there we find the big four-seated carriages and coaches in which we are to enjoy the two-mile drive to Mont-Lawn. By this time we are quite as excited as the children, and we are delighted to find ourselves in the very first carriage with a load of boys. We even discover that we are shouting, too, as we begin the long climb up, up, to the beautiful green hills beyond the town.

Long before the drive is over, the boys are dropping off one by one, only to scamper ahead and exult over the great out-of-doors all about them. You are almost tempted yourself to clamber cautiously down—when the carriage swings around the last curve, and you are dumb with amazement: on each side of the road, perched on the fence, and lined up along the wall, are more than two hundred children shouting at the top of their voices: "Spring chicken to-day! spring chicken to-day!"

It is our welcome to Mont-Lawn! You are still wide-eyed with surprise when we roll through the gates and up the sloping driveway to the Children's Vacation Home.

Home! You know all about "Homes"—the kind that begin with a capital letter. Involuntarily you picture to yourself a big oblong building with square corners and checker-board windows, and with endless rows of rooms all alike opening upon long dismal halls that echo to the tread of black-gowned, severe-faced women attendants. All this you picture in your mind—then you look about you.

The carriage has stopped before the door of "The Homestead," and The Homestead is—just that: a homestead; a roomy, white-painted house with hospitable verandas, and wide-flung doors leading to an inviting-looking hall. Nowhere do you see the big, oblong building; instead your eyes fall delightedly on picturesque cottages with quaint little windows and porticoes, and with a homelike air that is irresistible. The black-gowned, severe-faced women attendants—they, too, are nowhere to be seen. In their place are girls—charming, fresh-faced, delightful; young women with smiling eyes and cheery voices.

Still in dazed wonder you descend from the carriage, and then the full beauty of the scene bursts upon you—the velvety lawns, the wide-spreading trees, the fields, the woods, the hills, and far in the distance the Hudson shimmering like silver in the sunlight; and you wonder: "What must be the effect of all this on the stunted, warped, beauty-starved atoms of humanity that know only a dirty alleyway in a city slum?"

Very soon you are reminded again of the Fourth. It is in the air. Everywhere the care-takers, or "teachers," as the children call them, are flitting about with anxious eyes and deft fingers.

In the morning of the 4th a firecracker wakes you; then the tattoo of a whole bunch brings you to your feet, and sets your blood to tingling. Outdoors you find the "Glorious Fourth" in full swing. Everywhere are shouts and laughter, and the flutter of red, white, and blue. Everywhere are the children. At the sound of a bell they come running from all directions, and your eyes fill as you watch them scramble into line. Yonder is Benny, with a cruel hump between his tiny shoulders. Near him is Tony, whose frail, twisted little body was straight and strong before it was taken from beneath the fender of the trolley-car. In the girls' line there is Rosy—poor little Rosy with her crutches and with the pitiful vacancy beneath her short skirt where the other little leg and foot should be. There is Lucy, too, whose tiny body made the teachers weep and turn away, so covered with bruises was it, from a cruel step-mother's beatings.

But Benny and Tony and Rosy and Lucy are not thinking of these things. Bless you, no! Their eyes are shining, and their mouths are fairly watering for the good things that they know are waiting for them on the long tables in "Fort Plenty," the beautiful Dining Pavilion, whose walls carry the well-chosen verse:

> Back of the loaf is the snowy flour;
> Back of the flour, the mill.
> Back of the mill is the wheat and the shower,
> The sun and the Father's will.

Long before noon the guests begin to arrive.

Did you ever hear children shout? I can almost see your calm smile of superiority, as you remind me of Jimmy and Tom and Fred, your own boys. But I shall still shake my head. You have not hear children shout if you have not heard the tenemer waifs at Mont-Lawn give their lusty welcome.

Imagine it: three hundred little throats lustil cheering; six hundred little hands and arms fra tically waving, and almost every little foot in t throng dancing up and down like mad. And that the welcome good Dr. Klopsch used to get on eve visit he paid to the Home.

Things move then with a rush. First, dinner i the great Pavilion; then the exercises in the bea tiful Temple with the stirring voice of patriotisr and the reverent hush of prayer. Then come t exercises on the lawn with the words of great me to inspire us, and the strains of sweet music charm us. After that the day is one whirl frolics, games, drills, and marches, until the supp with its tread of pink and brown and white ic cream makes the hearts—and the stomachs—three hundred children too full for utterance.

The last carriage has rolled slowly down t driveway. In the Homestead lights are twinklin From one cottage after another come the soft voi of the good-night prayer, and the swe cadence of a song sung by voices that ha already nearly reached the Land of Nod. F away on the river a search-light leaps fro the darkness and falls for a moment on t Stars and Stripes floating above the Hom stead door.

Then all is dark and silent—and the Four is over.

Interest in Mont-Lawn continues to gro and many of our readers are writing to u intimating their wish to have a share in th beautiful charity this year. One lady, M C. W. C., of Battle Creek, Mich., write "Enclosed please find $6 to apply to the fur for the Children's Home—to keep two litt ones for ten days each. I wish it were mor When the two get to Mont-Lawn, I wish th would write to me." We will certainly try get them to do so. Little Miss Louise B., Santa Anna, Tex., ($3) writes: "I am a litt girl of four years and live in the country, a I wish the little children could have a count home." Mr. F. G. Bogle, general merchar Pawnee City, Neb., sends a very generous gi of $100 and H. N. Bogle send $25 to be appli to the Home. This will give forty-two litt tenement waifs a ten days' outing apie "You have our prayers for your efforts in this gre work," write the donors. From San Mateo, Fl Mrs. F. C. writes: "This little gift ($3) is from o Sunday School to be used for one little boy or gi We celebrated Children's Day last Saturday and was the wish of the children that their offeri should be used in this way." Mr. J. W. L., S Sabas, Tex. ($6), writes: "This money was hand to me by little Misses Armour Leigh Burleson a Elizabeth Hill, who have been working at odd jo and selling eggs to raise this money to send t children to Mont-Lawn. They are very much inte ested in the work that is being done there and ho to send another contribution before the summ season is over."

We have received cot endowments for the seas from a number of friends in different States, b there are still many cots remaining to be provid for. We feel assured that our friends will ta these up, that the endowment for the present se son may be, as it now promises to be, the largest the history of the Home.

How Frog Centre Became Free

By MRS. SUSAN M. GRIFFITH

I WISH you would drive down into Frog Centre, Melville," said Mrs. Humphrys to her husband, as ey entered their home town after a ıgthy drive into the open country. want to see my washerwoman about ing up my curtains."

Grenville was not a large town, obably numbering no more than teen thousand, a little "city of urches," half hidden among the sur-unding hills, comfortable, and quiet, d restful; but even lovely Grenville d its disease spot, and this was Frog :ntre.

Some narrow back streets surround-g a dank, dark pond, covered with een scum in which the frogs held gh carnival, and about ıich the children played, d in which one was some-nes drowned — this was :og Centre.

The very common people ed here of course—the peo-e who find it barely possible exist upon their daily ıge; people with no pros-cts above the dismal barren esent and very little, if y, ambition. They worked d ate and slept and smoked the froggy atmosphere, and ew little else. Sundays they ınged about the pond in the ade of the trees or sat upon ch other's doorstone, talk-g together of the common ents of the common day, d that was all. "A city of urches" was Grenville, but ere was not even a mission Frog Centre, not even a ınday School, and there was saloon! So, you know what disease spot Grenville had her midst—one far more adly than the great white ague!

Mr. Melville Humphrys was enthusiast in Sunday hool missionary work. He d been superintendent of e Elm Street Sunday School r fifteen years, and was ever udying new methods to ad-nce its interests, and mak-g plans for it to reach out d help others. As he sat the little open buggy while s wife was talking to Mrs. ıdy about washing her curtains, d looked about at the villain-s frog pond, the dirty, neglected, gged children playing around it, the -kept, wretched homes, the unkempt ɔmen, the shuffling, slouching men, e bare door-yards bestrewn with aste paper, old rags, and tin cans, d the dirty, evil-smelling streets, his ıristlike heart was moved with com-ıssion, and he began thinking big oughts the while he whistled softly himself and talked kindly to the ildren; for Mr. Humphrys always d a band of children around him herever he went. His wife laughed see them scatter as she came out, r they had been clambering all over e buggy, and hanging to the wheels, d taking liberties with the horse.

"You do beat all, Melville," she said they drove away, followed by the ıze of the small multitude. "Chil-en cluster about you like flies about a honey-pot, but they run when they see me. I do wonder why it is."

"You mustn't forget that I have made some of my biggest investments in the children's world for the last fifteen years," replied her husband. "It is a matter of business as well as affinity, and brings me business returns. And, you know, I am always looking out for new jewels among them. There are lots of small 'diamonds in the rough' in the dreadful place we have just left. I wish I knew how to get them polished for the Master. I must think it out."

"They clambered all over the buggy and hung on to the wheels"

The result of Mr. Humphrys' thought came out the next Sunday—it was the third Sunday in June and the children were already looking for some notable plan to be presented for the Fourth of July—when he began smiling that great, big smile of his which always meant "something splendid."

"I wonder how many of you girls and boys know exactly what the Fourth of July means?" he asked, the smile getting bigger and bigger until it took in the whole Sunday School within the radius of its sunshine.

Hands flew up all over the room.

"Fire-crackers!" shouted one little fellow. "Powder-bustin'!" said another. "Picnics!" said a shy little girl, "an' lots to eat." "Flags!" announced another, "an' speeches, an' Ole Glory 'n' p'rade!"

Mr. Humphrys' big smile faded; he looked grave. "Yes," he said, "it means all those things, of course, but it means something else a great deal more, children. It means freedom, and because we are so glad that we are a free people, we have a holiday—it ought to be a holy day to every one of us—and have just as good a time as we can. You older girls and boys who have studied history, know all about the Declaration of Independence and how the people of '76 fought with England to free the country from her oppression and tyranny. But, children, what I want you to see is this: We are making a bigger fight for freedom to-day, as soldiers of Christ, a far greater fight. Satan and sin are oppressing us. They are making slaves of people with ignorance, and strong drink, and uncleanness, and low pleasures, and we have a place right here in Grenville that is in dreadful bondage. We want to help Jesus Christ to set that place free; we want to help it to become independent of the many things which are pulling it down and making slaves of its people. Now, I suspect that some of you know a lot more about Frog Centre than I do, but I saw enough the other day to make my heart ache and fill it brim full of a big desire to fight to set it free; for Satan has a terrible hold on that little place. Now, won't you children help me? I am calling the grown folks children, too, because, you know, we are all children in God's sight. We expect to have our usual picnic out at Emerald Springs the Fourth, and I am going to make a suggestion. This is it: Suppose we, the Elm Street Sunday School, invite Frog Centre to our picnic! They will be our guests, and it will take some money and a lot more baskets to afford them free transportation and to feed them, and it will also take a good deal of—well, I'll call it self-effacement or self-forgetfulness, but I believe it will certainly pay! In fact, I know it will, because it will be laying up treasure in the bank of heaven; it will be lending money to the Lord, and no one pays such interest as Jesus, remember that. We want to open the eyes of Frog Centre; we want to show these people over there that there are other pleasures beside the 'pleasures of sin.' And, children, I mean this to be only the beginning of things. I mean to have a general cleaning up in Frog Centre. We must plant a Sunday School over there; we must drive out that saloon; we must redeem that plague spot of Grenville! We must give it liberty! If we let it go on, it may, probably it will, infect our whole city. Now, will all of you help me?"

Oh, of course they would help him—and arrangements were made and committees formed, and plans rolled into a perfect system in ten minutes, and every active worker had a badge of red, white and blue pinned on the left shoulder. And the picnic was the greatest success the Elm Street Sunday School had ever achieved. Of course, all of Frog Centre did not go to Emerald Springs, but fifty children went, a goodly number of young women, some young men and a few older ones; and those who did go had the "time of their lives," I am sure of that! And Mr. Melville Humphrys made himself not only acquainted with every one of them, but exceedingly popular. He was everywhere, beaming on everybody with his big smile, and before it was over had obtained the consent and co-operation of every Frog Centerite to begin a Sunday School and preaching service in their midst. The battle was on, the smoke rising like incense to the skies, and Mr. Melville Humphrys felt that already the day of victory was at hand!

It is safe to say, that no one would know Frog Centre now. The streets are models of cleanliness, the saloon a thing of the past, flowers bloom in grassy yards, the houses are neatly painted, and the dark, dank pond has been transformed into a beautiful little lake. The old name has gone also. Instead of Frog Centre it is Lake View now.

And the Fourth of July had an altogether new meaning to the Elm Street Sunday School after that. They began to understand, just a little, why our beautiful, stainless flag deserves to be called "Old Glory!"

TOPICS OF INTEREST THROUGHOUT THE WORLD

—JUNE DESERVES to be remembered in the annals of aeronatics. What a brilliant galaxy of bird-men have "cleft the ue" successfully in one little month—Curtiss, Hamilton, Mars, ıldwin, Brookins, Owens and others, all sailing about and aying fantastic tricks above towers and steeples at a mile-a-inute gait. It's not surprising that Hamilton, the pluckiest the lot, should have predicted that "everybody will be flying on."

—THE LATEST PERIODICAL war scare has an English source this ne. Mr. Gerard Fiennes, a writer of some prominence, pre-cts a conflict between this country and Japan before 1915. Japan," he says, "will fight the United States very much for e same reason that prompted Bismarck to fight France." urope, he believes, would not interfere to save the Philippines. Here, however, his logic fails; for if Europe considers that Spain was harshly dealt with, how would the matter be mended by the islands going to Japan? War-making on paper is the refuge of sensational writers, when other topics fail to interest. If all the paper predictions of war came true, the world would be a miserable place to live in.

—THE NEW YORK Sun's London correspondent relates some of the ludicrous malapropisms of a famous English college "don," Dr. Spooner, who seems to have been a Mr. Partington in disguise. Some of his odd sayings—the oddity of which consisted usually of a comical transposition of words—are of almost national fame. Once at a party he asked a brother guest to "pass the pigs fleas," when he simply meant "the figs—please." He it was, too, according to rumor, who began the hymn by reading the line "From Iceland's greasy mountains," and who spoke of the words of the wicked as being sharp and piercing "like ears and sparrows." "Are you aware, sir," he once asked a strange worshiper in chapel, "that you are occupewing my pie?" The stranger stared and vanished. In the course of a sermon he spoke of the vague, half-formed wish of the mind as "the half-warmed fish," spoiling the figure and convulsing the congregation. Whether he was a victim of aphasia or pure absent-mindedness is uncertain. "Am I addressing you or your brother?" he asked of an astonished gentleman whose brother was his twin. It is hard to believe that such a blunderer could roam at large, no matter how talented he might have been in some respects.

An Agent's Opinion

THERE is not a cleaner, more religious and moral family magazine published in the United States than THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. I found great pleasure in selling it; it pleased my customers. I hope to live to see it have the greatest number of readers of any paper in the world. It is truly a family paper and I wish it could be in every home in America.

☆ TWO MORE STARS ADDED TO THE FLAG ☆

ARIZONA and New Mexico are about to take on new dignity in the eyes of the world. Their existence as territories is drawing to a close and they will soon have State governments of their own, as President Taft has just signed the bill admitting them to full membership in the sisterhood of States. Two more stars will be added to "Old Glory" and in no part of the country will the new flag with its increased constellation be more popular or more loved than in these two progressive commonwealths of the Southwest.

The two territories have been knocking for several years at the door of Congress for admittance as States. For a while it seemed as if they would have to wait some time before their cherished ambition was realized. President Taft, however, was heartily in favor of admitting them, and was greatly pleased when he was able to sign the bill providing for their statehood. Now Arizona and New Mexico must hold conventions and prepare constitutions acceptable to Congress, and then they can start in business as self-governing commonwealths.

There was quite a formal ceremony at the signing of the bill. There were present in the President's office at the White House Postmaster-General Hitchcock, Senator Beveridge of Indiana, Congressmen Cole and Hamilton of the House Committee on Territories, and the delegates from the two territories, Andrews and Cameron. Mr. Hitchcock brought a gold pen which he asked the President to use. Mr. Andrews had brought an eagle feather pen to be used for the same purpose. The President settled the difficulty by using both on each document, greatly to the relief and satisfaction of the men who wished to have their pens used on the historic occasion. He signed one-half of his name with the pen and one-half with the quill.

Delegate Cameron wished to have some memento of the event, so he took the blotter the President used and tucked it carefully away in his coat pocket, to be preserved as a family heirloom.

Word that the President had signed the bill making the two territories States was sent over the wire to Arizona and New Mexico, and they proceeded at once to celebrate in a way which made previous celebrations seem very tame and cold affairs. Great mass meetings were held at Las Vegas, Roton and Santa Fé, and a telegram of hearty congratulation was sent by Acting-Governor Jaffa to Acting-Governor Young of Arizona, and the latter sent his felicitations in return.

Both new States are preparing for their constitutional conventions, which will be held soon. New Mexico hopes to have her constitution ready for submission to President Taft and Congress by next December. It is expected that the State will adopt a conservative constitution.

Already there are numerous candidates for the Senatorships. THE HOME QUEEN'S REALM

Women in Council

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

AFTER the roses of June have faded and the exquisite peonies have ceased to bloom, the garden continues to be beautiful in the lush growth of midsummer. When July comes in with fervid heat, the lilies come too, and the nasturtiums are in their glory. The sweet peas with their wonderful variety of color reward the gardener, and as for the vines, they are by this time so luxuriant that they form a pleasant shade as they climb to the veranda roof. The home queen has many things to interest her at this moment.

How to Keep the House Cool

"My way of keeping the house cool is to air it well in the early morning, opening all windows and doors to admit whatever breeze is blowing. For this purpose I rise early. The vital quality in the morning air lessens with the heat of the sun. All my windows and doorways are perfectly screened, so that the pest of the summer, the unwholesome fly, cannot force his way inside. Flies are not only unCleanly, but are bearers of infection; and no good housekeeper will let them enter her premises if she can help herself. About nine o'clock I darken the house, close the shutters and frequently close the windows as well. By keeping the house closed until five in the afternoon, when I again open it to the air, I have solved the problem of how to keep it cool. L. W. D"

An opposite direction is given by another matron:

"At this time of the year complaints are heard on every hand about the heat. I never encourage my family in talking about their discomfort. I am not one of those people who go about murmuring and moaning. I believe in accepting things as they are. I keep doors and windows open, and let the breeze fan me as it will. In the beginning of the season I sprinkle palm leaf fans all over the house, and in the dining-room I keep a big ice-cooler filled with water that is always on tap for the thirsty. We dress in the coolest way we can, we avoid hot meats and desserts, and go on with our work precisely as we would were we in the depths of winter. I do not like a house to be as dark as a cellar when all the world is full of light. R. M. T."

Here are the views of two excellent matrons. You may take your choice, or you may modify them, just as you like.

The Misery of Insomnia

"I am a victim of persistent insomnia, and I cannot take opiates. Can the friends in the Council suggest a cure for this distressing form of illness? D. L. M."

You may well speak of sleeplessness as a form of illness. When night after night one lies wide awake, tosses upon a restless pillow or walks the floor in nervous distress, the case is indeed serious. Sleep is divinely sent to make up for us the wastes of the day. "I laid me down and slept," said the Psalmist; and then "I awaked, for the Lord sustained me." "I giveth his beloved sleep," is often applied to the rest of death, but night after night as the eyes close and we drift into dreamland, we are sharing a love gift of the heavenly Father. The victim of insomnia should take as much exercise out of doors as she can during the daylight hours. To have the right amount of physical fatigue, neither too much nor too little, is to be prepared for healthful sleep. If there are cares and anxieties, they are apt to loom up with menacing faces in the night season. Carry all the cares and solicitudes to the Lord in prayer before you lie down. Sleep in a well ventilated room. Sometimes a little light refreshment, thin bread and butter, or a cup of hot milk taken in the night, will induce sleep. You are fortunate in not being able to take opiates. They afford only temporary relief, and the habit of depending on them grows imperceptibly and weakens character. This question is open for discussion. If there is any one in the Council who has been a sufferer from insomnia and has been cured, she is invited to relate her experience.

Thoughtless Husbands

"One of your correspondents said lately that her husband never seemed to think she needed an outing, and that he supposed her in little need of domestic help. She is by no means singular. Husbands are not always thoughtful, nor are wives always treated as they should be. I think equal political suffrage would help us. Many men look down upon women and think them inferior, because women have not the ballot. A man will discuss political situations with other men, and is amazed if he finds that his wife has an opinion about politics. Yet the wife is often more interested than the husband in the character and qualifications of the school teacher, in the purity of milk, the putting down of saloons and other important things than is the husband. I am hoping for a day when women, equally with men, shall share the responsibilities of politics in this country. A FRIEND OF WOMEN."

When we begin to speak on the subject of votes for women we are in the position of the person who throws a stone into a lake. The agitation thus caused stirs the ripples to the farthest edge of the pool. What have you to say about this timely topic? Don't be afraid to handle the subject without gloves. Both sides have an equal right to be heard.

NEW PETS ON THE FARM

A CITY child in the country makes many strange and wonderful discoveries. The little fellow in the photograph is visiting on a farm, and is literally having "the time of his life." The fluffy little creatures, which seem inordinately fond of swimming, are new to the city child who has never seen a duck pond.

The Teaching of Thrift

AN investigation has lately been started by Dr. Ashcroft, late president of Ohio Normal College, with a view to ascertaining what ideas the ordinary little man and maid who go to school have on the subject of economy. Thirteen hundred school children were questioned about the way they would manage money if they had it—whether they would spend it or save it, what they would buy, and what they would do with money if they found it. To the credit of their honesty, it was found that nearly all the children questioned declared that if they found money in the street or anywhere else they would at once try to find the owner. The other answers to questions were less satisfactory to the investigator. Many children rush to the candy store to spend their pennies, and if they have cash enough they cannot resist the soda fountain and the ice-cream saloon. Children who have a definite allowance learn economy and responsibility more quickly than is possible for those to whom money is given by indulgent relatives. Undoubtedly, this subject is important and should receive the attention of parents and teachers. Frugality is not an American virtue. We live on a large scale and when we have money we spend it lavishly; when we have none we are compelled to go without luxuries. This is rather apt to be the rule with the well-to-do. The children of the very poor are less likely to be trained in habits of thrift than the children of wealth. Precisely as a king's sons are obliged to study hard and acquire many accomplishments, the children of an American millionaire are early compelled to look upon property and money with respect.

The Afternoon Nap

A nap in the afternoon is by no means a waste of time, if it be regularly taken by the busy housemother. She may feel that she has no right to such an indulgence and may refuse to yield to indolence, claiming that she is never tired until the right time comes for going to bed at night. If, as is usual with many a farmer's wife, her day begins at five o'clock and is hardly over before ten in the evening, she should by all means lie down in a darkened room and close her eyes for an hour in the mid-afternoon. The first three or four days sleep will elude her, but if she persists, drowsiness will steal over the brain and she will find that the oblivion of sleep will give her new strength to carry her cares cheerfully. The children will easily learn not to disturb mother when she is lying down, and the husband, if he be the lover he ought to be, will appreciate the good his wife gains by taking this bit of care of her health.

This advice is not limited to women in the country. The mistress of a city house requires it and an experiment will convince her of its usefulness. Do not wait until the physicians order you to seek sanitary springs, but take your rest cure at home before you reach the breaking point. If you are young, the afternoon nap will help you preserve your beauty. If you are old, it will help to make you young again.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-All

—S. J. I agree with you that a mother's influence is vital and far-reaching. I am sure that a mother in heaven may watch over her little ones on earth. The day may come when they will meet her, and hear in the heavenly land how much she loved them, although she was out of their sight. The thought of a mother in the presence of God should be very sacred to sons and daughters who are on earth.

—ELSIE W. If your sister-in-law treats you so that you feel unwelcome do not prolong your visit in her home. I advise you to begin earning your own living as soon as possible. If your special talent is for millinery you can easily obtain profitable employment. As for losing caste among your acquaintances, dismiss the thought as unworthy. No friends worth having look down upon a woman when she is doing useful work.

The Strawberry Handkerchief

A Tale of Colonial Days in Old New York

By AMELIA E. BARR

"I TELL you, friends, it was well worth the journey to England to hear William Pitt speak," said McLeod; "and he rejoiced because the Americans had refused to be robbed by act of Parliament."

"I wish then that I had gone with you," said the Captain regretfully. "I might have gone. I wish I had."

"Far better it was for thee to be at home, Jan. Thou would have wanted to have thy say, even in the Parliament house."

"Well, then, why not? The right and the wrong of everything, I know; they did not."

"Pitt knew. He took your place for you, good friend. It was on the 14th of January I first saw and heard him," continued McLeod. "Nugent was insisting that the honor and dignity of the King and nation demanded the compulsory execution of the Stamp Act. Then Pitt rose—you know his speech. After Pitt sat down, Mr. Conway rose, and said he agreed with Mr. Pitt in every particular. Then Grenville jumped to his feet, and said the factious rebellious spirit in the House of Commons made the colonies rebel; and so the quarreling went on, until the House clamored for Pitt, and would hear no one else. Then Pitt rose again, and floods of light poured from his eyes, and his voice, thrilled wi' passion, made every heart tingle. 'I rejoice that America has resisted,' he cried, and the House rose cheering, and he repeated the assertion. But though he spoke wi' the tongue of men and angels, he could not settle the weary business; for at four o'clock in the morning—after a whole night's discussion—only Pitt and two others were for repealing the Act; three hundred were for letting the Treasury do what it pleased with the Americans."

"That made us taxable at the will of the English House of Commons," cried the Captain.

"Yes, just so; and Mr. Secretary Conway rose immediately, and said, 'Then American representatives must be admitted at once to this House.' He was supported by the great judge, Lord Camden, who said, 'Representation and taxation are joined by an eternal law of nature."

"Camden was right, and we knew it, and will stand for it with our lives!" almost shouted Jansen.

"Don't break my china, Jan," cried Madame, for he had struck the table a ringing blow, as he uttered his defiance. "Now, then, McLeod," she continued, "what brought about such a great change of feeling in Parliament?"

"The people of England and Scotland, my dear Madame—the people! the majesty of the manufacturers! and the almighty trading and working classes! A general insurrection was at hand. Artisans all over England were out of work, and England was facing a commercial ruin to which ours would be but a bagatelle. I tell you, Madame, it was a time to live, and to feel how justice can quicken the heart, and stir the blood of a man. I never had much respect for talking before, but talk won this battle. Glory be to William Pitt, and Mr. Secretary Conway!"

"Were you present at the Repeal?" asked Virginia.

"All the deputies were there. About midnight, a large fair man, attended by a slim, dark youth, took the floor, and it is easy enough to remember the few words he said. His name was Settle of Settlebourne."

"Tell us," said Virginia breathlessly.

"'Gentlemen and Commoners of England!' he cried in a voice that penetrated the House. 'I've had my say in this place before, and I've only a word or two this night for you, but I ask you to remember—that the invasion of one natural right will be made the precedent and justification for another—and another. Where will that business stop? And remember, likewise, that if the arbitrary power now trying itself on the Americans gets its own way, you will have it in England next—for what the King may do on one side of the Atlantic, he will not fail to do on the other. So, if you do not intend to repeal the Stamp Act, I advise you to go to your homes as soon as ever you can, get your tenantry together, and drill them in your meadows.' He sat down amid tremendous shouting, and soon after the count was taken, and the repeal of the Stamp Act passed, by two hundred and fifty to one hundred and twenty-two. The doors were flung wide open, the count declared, and in a few minutes tens of thousands were shouting, 'Repealed! Repealed!' through every street in the waiting, sleepless city."

Virginia sighed with happiness. The large, fair man—with the dark youth at his side—filled her imagination. Joris had been in the heart of that tremendous scene, and she surrounded him with all the glory of it.

In the morning New York was astir and busy at the dawn of day. No one could be busy enough. Arent had gone to his ship while it was yet dark, and when he came home for breakfast, explained that he wished to be ready to leave for Norfolk in two days. "I have a large consignment of furs," he said, "but that is not sufficient. I am going to Norfolk. I must not let others get there before me."

Madame made no remark. Virginia plainly expressed her surprise and disappointment, but found it fruitless.

"There was no use in teasing him, Virginia. Very cross and displeased he feels," said Madame.

So on the morning of the third day, Arent was ready to sail. Madame did not ask to what port he was bound, and Arent offered no information. In the bright noon sunshine, he went, turning at the gate with his old boyish smile and ringing voice, to say another "good-by." Then they watched him hurrying down the road, as if he heard Rose calling him. Virginia's eyes were full of tears. Madame had an air of pathetic restraint. She would take no excuses, and no comforting. "My boy has left me—given me up—for a strange girl!" she cried—"I shall see him no more! Why does God give, and then take away?"

"Dear moeder, it is Rose, not God. And if Arent stayed here, very miserable he would make you, and all of us."

"I know! I know! When the heart has left the old home, to come back to it is foolish."

"Even for two days, moeder?"

"Yes, two days are then too much. Well, I must look to the house, everything is topsy-turvy again."

A little later Virginia called: "Moeder, do you not hear the drums, and the shouting?"

"Well, then, it will be the Repeal Bill at least. I wish we were done with that weary Stamp Act."

"Give me this day. If Joris comes, I shall be happy, and thou wilt be happy with me. If he does not come—I shall have a few hours—to put him out of my heart forever."

"A few hours! Poor child! But go dress thyself. I understand that. If the ship is in, it will not be half an hour before they are back again."

A great many people brighten their polished floors by wiping them, once or twice a month, with a cloth dipped in milk.

That is not a bad plan; but it is open to one serious objection. Milk brightens the floors but it does not clean them.

The way to clean, and at the same time, to brighten them, is to use Ivory Soap and tepid water. Apply with a soft cloth. Don't use much water. Wipe dry with another soft cloth (dry).

he ship was just outside, and the Sire and Joris were on deck, looking at the young metropolis—so white, and bright, among her tree-lined streets; based in sunshine, and vocal with the glad sounds of a rejoicing population. Gaily she came, courtesying to the crowd watching her; and the Manhatta was just going out, with all her sails set, and an air of business about her spick-and-span deck, and her young captain standing by the mainmast. Suddenly a youth on the government ship stepped forward, lifted his hat, and called to Arent. Arent heard the voice, looked up, and saw Joris; lifted his hat, and stood for a moment or two bareheaded. During this act of courtesy the ships passed, and the men had bid each other farewell forever. Never in life did they meet again.

In the meantime, Virginia, wearing her prettiest white dress, came downstairs to meet her lover. She had no pearls or gems to wear on this day—they were all with Peter Dieterich, and oh, how glad she was they were with Peter! But there were pansies at her breast, and a pink rosebud in her exquisite hair. She ran to the garden gate and gathered a handful of lilies of the valley, and put them on the table, and had scarcely done so, when she heard the tramp of Justice Artaveldt's carriage horses. Joris was coming now—she could hardly breathe. The tramp came nearer. She smiled faintly. "It will stop at the gate in one minute." She said this to her heart, and the next moment it had passed the gate! She could not believe it. She stepped hastily to the door. The carriage was open, and she saw plainly that only two men were in it. Neither of them was Joris. She turned cold as ice, sick as death. Joris had not come. Oh, what should she do? "I will wait one hour," she said; "after that, if he has not come—anything. I do not care what!"

At once, there was a sense of movement, a sound, and it came nearer. It was surely footsteps—they were quick strong footsteps—not her father's. They were the footsteps of Joris. Then she ran to meet him—and before a word could be uttered, he held clasped her to his breast and kissed her.

"I thought you had not come! I thought you were never coming again. My heart just telling my heart to break as quickly as it could."

"My darling! I could not keep away. I should have been here half an hour ago, but I saw the captain on the pier, and after leaving my cousin with him, I went to him."

"What did you say, Joris?"

"I said, 'Captain,' and he turned and looked at me a moment, then he put out his hand and said kindly, 'Thou, Joris, I am glad to see thee! I did not see wrong!'"

"Ah, my good father!"

"After that, all was plain and straight. We walked together as far as Peter Dieterich's house, and we forgave the past, and settled the future, as far as we could without thy help. Virginia, he has given thee to me!"

"I have myself to thee long ago."

"It is true, so sweet thou hast been! Let me not waiting longer. Be my wife next week. Sit down and talk with me. Let me hear thy voice again."

It was a long, long talk that followed and Madame disturbed it not.

"If they want me, they will call me," he thought; and they did call her, and he welcomed Joris with a kiss. But he asked him nothing—this day was Virginia's.

When it grew to sunsetting Joris had to leave, and as he rose he said, "My heart! give me back my betrothal gift."

"The strawberry handkerchief?"

"The strawberry handkerchief! Give it to me again, and never, never will I part with it."

She blushed red as a rose, and lifted her work bag, and took from it one of those pretty little boxes, made of two large well-fitting walnut shells; she unfastened it, and shook out the wonderful bit of cambric. With a kiss she laid it in his hands, and he looked pitifully at the cruel rent, and put it to his lips; for he saw that the darling girl had been darning it, with such infinite patience and labor as only love could teach her.

"Wonderful stitches!" he cried, "wonderful! wonderful! How long, my dear one, has it taken you to mend this finger length?"

"I began to mend it as soon as it was torn. It is very fine work. I could not do much at a time."

"I tore it, and I will join it."

"But how? I see not. What can thou do?"

Then he drew her close within his left arm, and took something from his vest pocket. "Come, beloved," he said, "we will join it with our wedding ring," and together, with a tender solemnity, they easily passed the strawberry handkerchief through it.

"It is a heavenly way, Joris!" said Virginia.

"I can never leave thee again, Virginia. As soon as we two are joined by this mystic circle, neither man nor woman can ever put us asunder."

For a few moments they stood speechlessly happy, with the rejoined handkerchief between them. Then they were aware of the soft roll of drums, and of shouting voices coming nearer. Hand in hand they went to the open door, and saw that it was a small body of Liberty Boys with their favorite leader, Isaac Sears. They had met the Captain at Peter Dieterich's gate, and were delighting themselves by escorting him home.

"Hurrah for Jansen Van Vroom!" shouted Sears, and the "Hurrah!" rang joyously out.

"A good man!"
A soft roll of drums said "Yes."
"A pure patriot!"
Again the rolling drums agreed.
"A thorough New Yorker!"
A long, loud roll of approval.

Then Joris and Virginia stepped outside, and their love story being well known, shout after shout of congratulations followed.

"Long love and long life to Joris Artaveldt and Virginia Van Vroom!" and to this order the drums beat rapturously, and the lovers leaned toward each other in visible beauty and delight.

"There will be no Stamps on your marriage papers, youngsters!" called Sears.

Thus to the roll of drums, the echo of song, and the kiss of lovers, this marvelous triumphant year of New York's story happily ends.

[THE END]

Recompense

"LORD, why this happiness so complete?"
"I was hungry and you gave me meat."

"Why this mercy, I can not think."
I was thirsty and you gave me drink.

"Hast thou forgiven my every sin?"
"I was a stranger and you took me in."

"Mine the robe and the crown I see?"
"When I was naked you clothed me."

"This my home forever with thee?"
"Sick and in prison you came unto me.

Come, my friend ever faithful and true,
Inherit the kingdom prepared for you."

July Suppers

Shot from Guns

Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice are as crisp as crackers, and four times as porous as bread. There was never a cereal food ever created so adapted for serving in milk.

In these unique foods the wheat or rice kernels are puffed to eight times natural size.

They are exceedingly porous, deliciously crisp, and they have a nut-like flavor. The coats are unbroken, and the grains are shaped just as they came from the fields.

Imagine what a supper dish these foods make when served in a bowl of milk.

Whole-Grain Foods

In crackers or bread you get but part of the wheat. In Puffed Wheat you get the whole grain.

In crackers or bread only part of the starch granules are broken. In Puffed Wheat or Puffed Rice every starch granule is literally blasted to pieces. The digestive juices act instantly.

So there is nothing so suitable as Puffed Wheat or Puffed Rice for a supper or bedtime or a between-meal dish. And there is nothing so good.

Puffed Wheat, 10c
Puffed Rice, 15c
Except in Extreme West

These are the foods invented by Prof. Anderson — the foods that are shot from guns.

The whole wheat or rice kernels are put into sealed guns. Then the guns are revolved for sixty minutes in a heat of 550 degrees.

The heat turns the moisture in the grain to steam, and the pressure becomes tremendous. Then the guns are suddenly unsealed, the steam explodes, and every starch granule is literally blasted to pieces.

The terrific explosion shoots out from the guns these delicious, digestible grains—the most delightful cereal foods in existence.

Serve Them With Berries for Breakfast

In the morning, mix these puffed grains with your berries. They are nut-like and crisp, and their blend with the berries gives something like a short-cake flavor.

Or serve the puffed grains alone—with milk or cream. You will realize then why people are eating a million and a quarter packages monthly.

Order them now — before you forget. For the people you serve will want Puffed Wheat or Puffed Rice every day in hot weather.

POSTAL SAVINGS BANKS

THE Postal Savings Bank bill, which for so many years has been advocated by various postmasters-general, has at last become a law, and as soon as it has been put generally in operation, it will be possible for people of even the smallest means, living in the most remote districts, to invest their savings in what practically amounts to government securities. It is one of the most important measures yet passed by Congress, and it is expected to have a compelling effect not only as an incentive towards general saving, but also in the matter of drawing into general circulation much money which is now being hoarded in out-of-the-way places.

For thirty years efforts have been made to establish a governmental banking system more or less similar to the one covered by the present law, and some remarkable contests have been waged for and against the advisability of its adoption. However, it is now a law, and we shall presently be able to judge from its practical working just how beneficial it will prove to be. There seems to be no doubt that it will prove to be a potent agent in inducing the poor classes to save.

The idea is to open a banking department in the various postoffices, particularly in remote districts where banking facilities are now lacking. Under the new law anybody over ten years of age will be able to open an account in one of these postal banks. No deposit of less than one dollar will be received, but each postmaster will be authorized to sell special ten-cent stamps which may later be turned in after ten have been collected and a credit of one dollar received by the depositor on his account. Thus it will be possible for a poor person to begin saving with one dime and keep increasing this until one dollar has been accumulated in stamps, when he or she may open an account with the United States government. No one will be allowed to deposit more than $100 during any calendar month and no single account will be permitted to exceed $500. The government will pay 2 per cent. interest on all deposits.

The money collected by the various postoffices in this manner will be deposited in State and national banks named under the new law as depositories of postal savings funds. These banks will be required to put up public securities (State, county and municipal bonds) as security for the deposits.

Protecting the Money

One of the main points of opposition to the postal savings banks has been the above authorization to invest the deposits in government securities, but it is now acknowledged that these deposits will help the government solve the problem of issuing the new Panama bonds. These bonds were authorized, but have not been issued. It has been generally conceded that they would have to pay an interest rate of at least 2½ per cent., and to attempt to float them at this rate would have had the effect of sending the seven hundred million of government 2 per cent. bonds now held by the National banks probably below par. On account of this probability the government has refrained from issuing the new bonds and in the meantime has been hard pressed to finance the Panama Canal construction expenditures out of its working balance. However, under the new law the government will be able to invest in these 2½ per cent. bonds and reimburse the United States treasury and its Panama expenditures without disturbing the now outstanding 2 per cent. bonds.

All funds acquired by postal banks will be under the supervision of trustees composed of the postmaster-general, the attorney-general and the secretary of the treasury. These trustees will decide what postoffices shall be authorized to receive deposits, and all postal banks and depositories will be under their direct control.

Pass books will be issued to depositors just as by any savings bank and the withdrawal of funds will be permitted at any time. Five per cent. of the total deposits will be held by the Treasurer of the United States as a reserve to guarantee the payment of depositors and for a provision authorizing the withdrawal of 30 per cent. of the deposits for investment in government bonds, and the depositors are also to be permitted to transform their deposits into bonds when they so desire.

The Government Pledge

To establish the first of the postal savings banks $100,000 is appropriated and it is declared expressly in the bill that "the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment of the deposits made in postal savings depository offices with approved interest thereon as herein provided."

It will be interesting to observe the working out of this postal savings system. That it will do immense good in inducing the poor classes to save money there can be no doubt. The ability to purchase stamps at ten cents apiece and have them credited to one's self in the form of a bank account backed by the personal word of Uncle Sam is without doubt so alluring that many people will be induced to save money in this way who never saved money before in their lives. Saving is, after all, merely a habit, and once it is thoroughly acquired is probably as hard to break as any other habit.

For those people who could not be induced to save in any other manner, the system will without doubt be of great benefit, but for those who have already acquired the saving habit, it is a question whether the government postal banks system will prove of advantage. Persons of this class have already been taking advantage of private systems of thrift which embody as much of a sense of security as that offered by the government and which at the same time provide a greater reward for the saver; that is to say, higher interest.

The Interest Feature

It will be remembered that in a previous article we commented at some length on the low interest bearing feature of government bonds, and as the interest rate offered by the postal savings banks is quite as low as that which it has been recently possible to obtain on government bonds, the same objection may apply. The government will not permit more than $500 to be deposited in any one postal bank account. What then is the depositor to do with his $500 after the limit has been reached? Is it probable that he would be content to earn but 2 per cent., or ten dollars a year, on such an amount of money when it will be easily possible to invest it in safe securities and earn more? Would he be content even to wait until he had deposited $500 before he would withdraw the money and invest it in some of those higher interest bearing securities?

In these days of competition, even bond houses offer inducements to the small investor to purchase securities piecemeal, that is, in small amounts at a time, and the man or woman who has got into the habit of saving towards the possible rainy day or towards the peaceable old age must make shift to have his or her money accumulate as speedily as possible.

As we stated in a former article, "the cost of living has increased so much in recent years that it has become a matter of necessity for people to earn more than they did formerly, and for the same reason money must be made to earn more than it did in previous years. How to do this safely is, of course, the problem." Still it is undoubtedly true that there are many safe investments which will yield a greater profit than the 2 per cent. which it is proposed to pay for money deposited in postal savings banks.

he Christian's Rewards Here*

ERHAPS the sweetest of earthly feelings is that of peace. No rebellion, no fierce longing for the untainable, no clashing of one's own ll against that of another—quiet, anquillity, peace. The meek, we are d, shall have "abundance of peace," the very crown of their great reard. And peace is always at the mmand of the follower of Christ.

Suppose that you possess a valuable operty. You entrust it to one in om you have absolute confidence. u have tried him again and again d he has never failed.

Around you may be panic and disess. Banks may be suspending payent. Commercial houses may be closig. What do you care? You are sorry those who are losing, but you have worry for yourself. You know that ur all has been deposited in a perctly safe place.

Such faith is seldom justified among en. Humanity at best is an imperct thing. But we have one to whom may entrust something far more ecious than our silver and gold—rselves, the essence of our souls. howing him in whom we have beved, we feel no fear of what man n do unto us. We may know perfect ace, if we are stayed on him.

Thus the most beautiful of gifts is e Christian's reward.

The most necessary of helps to learn t write is a copy. By following the py, you may become an expert penan.

The most necessary thing for the ght shaping of life is an ideal. This e Christian has in his great Leader. Life is a struggle, a bitter war with tan. In order to wage it successfly we must have armor. The Christn has the armor. He may gird his ins with truth; put on the breastate of righteousness; have his feet od with the preparation of the gosl of peace; take the shield of faith, e helmet of salvation and the sword the Spirit, and no evil can possibly uch him.

The idol of all right modern socialm—all lofty philanthropy—is work. ve all men useful and congenial work do—inspire in the hearts of men the ve of work—and the greatest obstacle the coming of the millennium has en removed.

The Christian has his work cut out him, and if he is a true Christian is eager to do it.

Faith, hope and love, the great trinr—these are the Christian's.

Faith — the substance of things ped for, the evidence of things unen. By faith, we climb the steeps of ng and bring the Lord Christ down our human needs. By it we commit r way unto the Lord, rest in him and it patiently for him. It is the hand which we reach to God.

And Hope, that anchor of the soul, re and steadfast—how could we ile without it? The hope that we y retrieve the shattered fortune; at we may reclaim the wandering ld; that we may some time meet ose whom we have "loved and lost hile," supports us through the sternt trials.

But the Love, that is truly the greatt thing in the world, is pre-eminently e Christian's. As God's son, he looks to his Creator with filial affection. ward his brethren he yearns with all e poignant desire of true fraternity. nd as love begets love, so shall he ceive in kind his reward, good measre, pressed down and running over.

Peace, a high ideal, armor for the eat fight of life, a work to do and the ll to do it, and a heart filled with th, hope and charity—what more n a Christian desire?

Money cannot buy these great gifts; e Christian has them for the asking.

Letter-Writing*

IT has been said that we do not really know any one until we have corresponded with him. A letter often shows us a fresh and unsuspected side of a friend.

A great man once remarked that he loved to go away from home because he so much enjoyed the letters that his family wrote him.

To write a good letter is a very important accomplishment. Beauty or conversational power may have been denied you; but if you are able to write a graceful, dignified, vivid letter, you may possess a charm equal to any other.

The persuasive power of a letter may surpass that of speech. The spoken word passes quickly. The written word abides. You can read it over and over until its most vital and obscure meaning has penetrated to your very soul. Write then to the friend for whose salvation you may be yearning. Your oral pleadings may not have touched his heart, but your letter may unseal the hidden fountain of his love.

The model for the letter seems to have been preserved as substantially the same through all the ages. It is roughly fashioned upon the formal call or visit.

First come the salutations. We say, "My Dear Mr. Smith." Paul said, "To Philemon, my dearly beloved"; "To Timothy, my dearly beloved son"; and when he wrote to a church, he often saluted it with a beautiful benediction, "Grace be to you and peace from God our Father and from the Lord Jesus Christ."

After the conventional opening, which in one form or another has almost always seemed necessary, comes the real meat of the letter. It may be fierce and denunciatory like some of Paul's letters; or, again, full of logical arguments; or a compendium of practical advice, like Peter's; or full of caressing affection, like John's. The middle of the letter reveals the true purpose for which it was written.

Then comes the beginning of the end—the brief messages to and from friends and fellow-workers.

A benediction of some sort usually closes the Scripture letter; just as we say, "With much love and all good wishes," or something of the sort.

The letters of great men and women form a large part of literature. Without the letters of Matthew Arnold, the Brownings, the Tennysons, the great war-generals and scores of others, we could not have understood them, as now. They are full of interest and of revelations of the character of the writers.

Never neglect the regularly dispatched letter to the "old folks at home," when you are away from them. One who had been very busy during this past season failed to send home his usual weekly letter. A scrappy little postal card now and then was all that he vouchsafed, promising constantly to write more as soon as the stress was past.

Suddenly the news came to him that his mother had died. Conscience-stricken, he dropped everything and sought his distant home. He found that his mother had died with his last letter on her heart. It had been written weeks before. The three or four postal cards were piled on the table beside her. Her last words had been, "Hasn't his letter that he promised come yet?"

He was heart-broken, but his repentance was too late to help the gentle, loving mother.

Let us never forget the letter of thanks after hospitality; the letter of sympathy in sorrow; the letter of congratulation in joy; the letter to the minister, the lecturer, the writer, who has helped us. These are part of love of humanity, which is part of religion.

The Howard Watch

WHEN you hear someone criticise the railroads, just remind him that our American roads are the best and safest in the world. They employ the most intelligent men and have them use the finest watch—the HOWARD.

What do you think, for instance, of a road that, over a period of ten years, carried nearly two hundred million passengers without a single one killed as the result of a train accident; and, that during the three worst months of last winter, had a punctuality record of 94 1/10% for its inbound train service.

That road—the Lackawanna—is one of the 180 railroads that officially adopted the HOWARD Watch for their time-inspection service.

Lives depend on the accuracy of trainmen's watches, and the best is not too good for the American railroad man.

A HOWARD is always worth what you pay for it.

The price of each HOWARD is fixed at the factory and a printed ticket attached—from the 17-jewel (double-roller escapement) in a "Jas. Boss" or "Crescent" gold-filled case at $40 to the 23-jewel in a 14-k. solid gold case at $150.

Not every jeweler can sell you a HOWARD Watch. Find the HOWARD Jeweler in your town and talk to him. He is a good man to know. Drop us a postal card, Dept. W, and we will send you a HOWARD book of value to the watch buyer.

HARD TO PLEASE
Regarding the Morning Cup.

"Oh how hard it was to part with coffee, but the continued trouble with constipation and belching was such that I finally brought myself to leave it off.

"Then the question was, what should we use for the morning drink? Tea was worse for us than coffee; chocolate and cocoa were soon tired of; milk was not liked very well, and hot water we could not endure.

"About two years ago we struck upon Postum and have never been without it since.

"We have seven children. Our baby now eighteen months old would not take milk, so we tried Postum and found she liked it and it agreed with her perfectly. She is today, and has been, one of the healthiest babies in the State.

"I use about two-thirds Postum and one-third milk and a teaspoon of sugar, and put it into her bottle. If you could have seen her eyes sparkle and hear her say "good" to day when I gave it to her, you would believe me that she likes it.

"If I was matron of an infants' home, every child would be raised on Postum. Many of my friends say, 'You are looking so well!' I reply, 'Iam well; I drink Postum. I have no more trouble with constipation, and know that I owe my good health to God and Postum.'

"I am writing this letter because I want to tell you how much good Postum has done us, but if you knew how I shrink from publicity, you would not publish this letter, at least not over my name."

THE CHRIST FOUNDATION*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

"JESUS came into the parts of Cæsarea Philippi," near Dan, the northern limit of Palestine, at the base of Mt. Hermon.

"Who do men say that the Son of man is?" Jesus had not been going around delivering lectures about his divinity, but he had been doing the mighty works of God, knowing that his deeds would impress the people more than his words. He had not asked the people for their opinion of himself. He had in effect said: "Let my works speak for me," when John the Baptist sent two men to inquire of him: "Art thou the Christ, he that cometh, or look we for another?" "Go and tell John the things which ye hear and see: the blind receive their sight, and the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear, and the dead are raised up and the poor have good tidings preached to them. And blessed is he whosoever shall find no occasion of stumbling in me."

Jesus did not need to ask the question: "Whom do men say that the Son of man is?" He was a mind-reader. Often he had told the Pharisees what they were thinking about. He must then have asked the question for the benefit of the apostles. He desired to place before them a consensus of opinion concerning himself in order to confirm their judgment, and also to show them on what lines they must work to be leaders of the people.

"Some say John the Baptist; some Elijah; and others Jeremiah, or one of the prophets." They all agreed on one point: that Jesus was a great man. Reincarnation is one of the doctrines of Buddhism and Mohammedanism, and some forms of heathenism as well. But it was the Jewish people who had said that Jesus was a reincarnation of John, Elijah, Jeremiah, or one of the prophets. Where did they get such an idea? Possibly in Egypt; possibly from the inhabitants of the land, whom they had not driven out.

"But who say ye that I am?" Jesus drove the question home, and why? He certainly knew there was love and loyalty to him in the hearts of his apostles. We repeat he did it for the benefit of the apostles themselves. It would make them more pronounced followers to declare the faith that was in them. This incident may be compared with what we know as "taking the oath of loyalty," but it was not done in a formal manner.

"Simon Peter answered," either because he was the most outspoken of them all, or possibly because he was considered the senior apostle. He said: "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." He seemed to have grasped the allness of Christ. We can almost see the look of surprise upon the face of Jesus, and we can almost hear his gracious words: "Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-Jonah." Dr. Joseph Parker says: "Simon Peter was transfigured by his own answer; he was no longer a meanly-clad fisherman; the fire burned through his clothes; he was the tabernacle of the indwelling God."

"Flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father who is in heaven." Perhaps Jesus feared that Peter would be elated, and he desired not to bring him down, but to raise him higher as the surest way to keep him humble. And so Jesus by his words brought Peter into the very presence of the heavenly Father.

"Upon This Rock I Will Build My Church"

Surely Jesus did not mean that Peter should be the foundation of the church, but Christ the Son of the living God. It was the truth Peter had uttered, and not Peter himself. "The gates of Hades (hell) shall not prevail against it." Christ is the Strong Rock, the Rock of Ages—no mere man could be a foundation for the Church—it would be like building upon the sand. The church built on a rock is the Church built on Christ. We cannot think for a moment that Peter thought that Jesus meant to take him for the foundation of his Church.

"I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven." And so for centuries the artists and the sculptors have been making portraits of Peter bearing a bunch of keys! Jesus had no keys of that kind to give Peter; he surely did not bring them with him from heaven, neither did he have them made anywhere on earth. They were spiritual keys, if we may use that expression. They were not made of metal, or of wood as keys of that time were sometimes, but they were made of inspiration. They were in the soul of a man and not in his hands. Dr. Parker says: "No need of angry controversy, or grammatical wordiness, or critical inquiry into the exact meaning of the term, 'the keys.' This kind can only be understood by such minds as have almost realized the fulness and the elevation of inspiration itself. When you are inspired you have the keys. You do not hold the keys because of hereditary descent, or ecclesiastical relationship, or mechanical contrivance, or superior patronage—you hold the keys only as long as you realize the inspiration. And no man can take those keys from you. Everywhere the inspired man keeps the keys—in merchandise, in statesmanship, in philosophy, in adventure, in religious thinking, in Christian civilization."

"Whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven." A gross misunderstanding of these words of Christ has brought the confessional into existence. The Pharisees were right for once when they said: "Who can forgive sins but God alone?" What is rightly to be inferred from Jesus' words is that Peter and the other apostles were to have power in the Christian Church to be compared with that which the rabbis claimed in the Jewish Church.

"Binding and loosing" referred simply to acts or things; prohibiting them or else permitting, declaring them lawful or unlawful," says Dr. Edersheim, the distinguished Jewish author. He also says these powers Christ now transferred, and that not in their pretension but in reality, to his apostles, to Peter as their representative, and second, after his resurrection, to the Church." Thus it is by divine authority that it issues its "discipline," its "rules," etc.

"Tell No Man That He Was the Christ"

Jesus in these words charged his apostles not to preach Christ in the fulness of their apprehension of him; the people were not able to bear it. Those who had been intimately associated with the Christ for nearly three years must have had a divine secret beyond the ken of others.

"From that time Jesus began to show unto his disciples that he must suffer, be killed, be raised up." Jesus felt that the time had come when the apostles could comprehend his mission. How disappointed he was to have the leader among them say: "Far be it from thee, Lord." It was like the small cent of human love shutting out God's great love for the whole world. Peter lost his keys then! Figuratively, Peter was again sinking in the waves, instead of walking beside his Lord.

"Get thee behind me, Satan." We prefer to think that Jesus reproved the evil spirit that had for the moment taken possession of Peter under the guise of a loving friend, rather than that he reproved Peter himself. Under the spell of Satan, Peter did not apprehend the sufferings of Jesus.

"Let him deny himself, and take up his cross and follow me." To get any crown worth wearing there must be suffering. We should not know how to wear a crown unless we did suffer for it. And since suffering brings us into fellowship with Jesus, every affliction should seem joyous rather than grievous. (Heb. 12: 11.) Give us, Lord, the bread of tears!

"What shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" Some have paid a very small price! A bag of gold, a fine mansion, fame, etc. All of these are as bubbles which may burst any moment, and give very little satisfaction while they do last, compared with the riches that may be laid up for eternity.

"Till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom." The hour of Christ was nearer than the disciples thought, only a few weeks hence, for the time of this incident was the latter part of the third year of Christ's ministry. Not one of the disciples did "taste death" until after Christ came into his kingdom through his resurrection.

Believe, Receive and Confess Him

This brings us to the practical half of the lesson: "What think ye of Christ?"

No other name is given,
No other name is known';
'Tis Jesus, first and last;
He saves, and he alone.

"Mother," a little child once said, "how old must I be before I can be a Christian?" The wise mother answered: "How old will you have to be, darling, before you can love me?" "Why, mother, I have always loved you; I do now, and I always shall. But you have not told me how old I shall have to be." The mother replied: "How old must you be before you can trust yourself wholly to my care?" "I always did," she answered, "but tell me what I want to know," and she put her arms around her mother's neck. Then mother asked again: "How old will you have to be before you can do what I want you to do?" Then the child whispered, half guessing what her mother meant: "I can now without growing older." Her mother said: "You can be a Christian now, without waiting to be older. Don't you want to begin now?" The child answered: "Yes." Then they both knelt down, and in her prayer she gave to Christ her little one who wanted to be his.

Ask the little children what they think of Jesus.

In a certain hospital the child's ward was called "The Jesus Ward." One of the little sufferers asked his nurse why they called it by that name. She told him it was said that Jesus passed through that ward every night and blessed each suffering child. The little fellow said: "I shall raise my hand so that Jesus will be sure to see me." In the morning the nurse found a little hand raised in the air, but stiff and cold in death. Jesus had indeed come, and by that little hand had lifted the little sufferer into a realm where there is no more pain.

Ask the young men what they think of Jesus.

The venerable Dr. Tyng told of being called to visit a sick young man at a hotel. He and his widowed mother were on their way to their distant home when the young man became very ill. "He lay before me, a splendid youth of nineteen, his eyes like jets of the brilliancy of diamonds. 'Doctor Tyng,' he said, 'my mother has always told me that I must be converted; that I could not be saved except I was converted. How can I be converted?' I sat by the side of that youth and told him the story of Jesus. I showed him the simplicity of the Gospel plan of salvation. I bade him realize that his heavenly Father had received and accepted him in Christ when Christ willingly died to bear his load, and he was to come in the simplest faith of a little child, and rest himself gratefully, hopefully upon it. We spent an hour in conversation. Twenty-four hours after I called again. Oh! how changed the face! It shone like an angel's. He reached out his long, tapering, trembling hand to me with the sweetest smile and said: 'Oh, sir, I understand it. I understand it. Love for Jesus is conversion. Sir, all night I was asking Jesus to let me love him; to show me how to love him."

Ask the mature woman what she thinks of Jesus. "I would not allow any one to mention the subject of religion to me. I counted myself quite as good as those calling themselves Christians. I became somewhat feeble in health. One night I retired as usual, and after sleeping several hours I awoke suddenly, and felt as if I had been in heaven and had returned to earth. It was not a dream. Looking out of the window, the whole world seemed changed. Prayer and joy occupied my every thought. I longed to speak to some clergyman, but I was not acquainted with one. I opened the Bible and began to read it, and it was to me like a refreshing fountain. For a time the Bible was my sole companion in the secret change of my heart. I sought a church, but found that the views of the preacher about the Saviour and salvation were very different from mine. Then I went to another church where Christ was honored as the Son of God. The pleasures of religion became more deep, pure and permanent as I listened to the Word spoken with divine authority. I have now no interest in former trivial things, but I desire above all things to be obedient to Christ."

EXAGGERATED ADVERTISEMENTS

TO show our readers the effect which our guarantee has had in protecting them from undesirable advertisements, we take pleasure in relating the following, which was told us by one of the leading advertising agents in the United States:

This agent was requested to place some advertising for a foreign concern, which particularly desired to have THE CHRISTIAN HERALD included among the publications to be used. When the "copy" was forwarded to the agent, he refused to offer it to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and wrote to the advertiser giving it as his reason therefor that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD would be sure to decline the advertisement, because it contained some statements which seemed to be "in the nature of an exaggeration."

Our readers may see from this how anxious the advertising agent is to help us in the matter of publishing only honest advertisements. There was nothing intrinsically wrong with the proposition offered by the advertiser in the above quoted case. The objection was made merely on account of the wording, which might possibly have misled our readers into forming an exaggerated idea of the worth of a certain commodity. But the advertising agent felt constrained to make it nevertheless, because he was well acquainted with the fact that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD declines annually many thousands of dollars' worth of advertisements which might be detrimental to the interests of its readers.

Whenever any of our subscribers is defrauded by an advertiser in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD we will make good the claim, provided that the subscriber, who must be of record, has mentioned THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in writing to the advertiser, and provided the claim is made to us within two months of the date of the appearance of the advertisement.

Questions and Answers

Mrs. F. O. P., St. Louis, Mo. Please tell the origin of the proverb, "Still waters run deep."

Sir Walter Raleigh, in The Silent Lover, says: "The shallow murmur, but the deep are dumb" (1552-1618); John Lyly (1553-1601) said, in Euphues and His England (p. 287), "Where the streame runneth smoothest, the water is deepest." Shakespeare says: "Smooth runs the water where the brook is deep." The proverb, "Still waters run deep," is found in the German, Dutch and Danish.

E. R. H., Nora Springs, Ia. Who was "The Wandering Jew?"

A legend relates that a certain Jew, a doorkeeper in the palace of Pontius Pilate, was condemned to wander till the day of judgment for offering an insult to Christ on the way to Calvary. Matthew of Paris first published this legend in 1228. He professed to have derived it from an Armenian bishop. Many tramps have pretended to be the Wandering Jew, who belongs to the same class of myth as the Wild Huntsman and the Flying Dutchman. He has been poetically treated by Goethe, Schlegel, Schubert, Shelley, Croly and others, and has figured much in fiction.

M. L. U., Rahway, N. J. Please give the author of the poem, "My Mind to Me a Kingdom is."

According to Bartlett, it is by Edward Dyer (about 1540-1607). William Byrd's poem of the same name may be found in Dana's Household Book of Poetry (p. 652) and Bryant's Library of Poetry and Song (p. 565), and many other collections. The authors of the stories you mention cannot be found.

E. H. H., Athens, Mich. 1. How many libraries has Andrew Carnegie helped and how much money has he given for that purpose? 2. How many students and how much property has the school of which Booker Washington is president?

1. Mr. Carnegie has given away about $70,000,000; $55,000,000 of which have been in the United States. Most of this sum has gone into libraries, of which he has endowed 65 in New York. He had endowed 1,500 libraries up to January 1, 1906. 2. In 1904, the Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute had 62 buildings and a farm of 2,631 acres. The property was valued at $525,000; there were 1,500 students and a faculty of 151. Since then many gifts have been bestowed upon the school, and it has grown in every way.

D. H. M., Roanoke, Va. Explain the Nilometer by which the depth of the water in the Nile was measured.

The Nilometer, built by Caliph Suleiman 715-717 A.D., is on the island of Rodo, south of Cairo. It is an octagonal pillar graduated to 17 cubits of 21.386 in. It stands in a square well 16 feet deep. When the river rises to 15 2-3 cubits irrigation begins. There is another on the island of Elephantine.

N. O. L., Bridgeport, Conn. Where did the Miami Indians live when they were an independent tribe?

The Miamis lived in what is now Central Indiana and neighboring districts. They were Algonquins. A few still exist near Peru, Ind. The tribe was broken up by the War of 1812.

Mrs. R. F. F., E. Springfield, N. Y. Please tell the difference between the Roman Catholic and the Greek Churches.

No two churches are so much alike in their creed, polity and cultus as the Greek and Roman, and yet no two are such irreconcilable rivals. They agree much more than either agrees with any Protestant church. The schism between them was begun when the seat of Roman government was removed from Rome to Constantinople; and it culminated in the rivalry between the Patriarch of Constantinople and the Pope of Rome. The Greek differs from the Roman Church in the following particulars: the single procession of the Holy Spirit; the equality of the five patriarchs, and the rejection of the papacy as an anti-Christian innovation and usurpation; the right of the lower clergy (priests and deacons) to marry (though only once); communion in both kinds; trine immersion the only valid form of baptism; the use of the vernacular languages in worship; and a number of minor ceremonies.

Mrs. S. V. B., Ashville, Ala. Please tell the origin of the legend that the stork brings the children into the home.

It is said that St. Francis of Assisi once dreamed that he was in heaven. He begged that God would give him there the birds that he had loved on earth. Especially he desired the stork as a comrade. His prayer was granted; but the beautiful stork which was given him as a companion became homesick, and acted in so wild and strange a manner that the saints begged that he should be sent away. It was ultimately decided that he should be sent to earth to take a little angel to a family which desired children. Then he might return, but from time to time might again revisit the earth, taking with him a little angel to some longing parents.

I. I. A., Flushing, L. I. I have read in a poem of the Sunda Sea, but can not find it in a geography. Where is it?

The Sunda Sea is another name for the Java Sea, which lies between Borneo and Java.

F. P. C., Hot Springs, Calif. For what purpose is a sermon, or what should be the highest aim of the preacher when he stands in the pulpit?

His highest aim should be the winning of men and women from lives of spiritual indifference or active sin. The presentation of Jesus Christ, the world's Redeemer, and his Gospel should be his supreme task and should never be subordinated to the desire for oratorical fame or notoriety as a preacher of non-Gospel topics. We hold that the pastor who in his regular pulpit work neglects the Gospel, and discourses on other subjects, no matter how much of worldly fame or recompense they bring him, sacrifices a great opportunity.

V. S., Detroit, Mich. What is Hedonism?

It is an ethical theory in which pleasure is considered the chief good. See Sedgwick's Theory of Ethics, where the idea is fully discussed.

S. D. B., Corydon, Ky. When were January and February added to the other ten months, and whence did they derive their names?

In the reign of Numa Pompilius (about 700 B.C.) the second of the legendary kings of Rome, two months were added to the calendar—January and February, the latter coming first. This arrangement was continued until 452 B.C. January derives its name from the two-faced god Janus, as the month looks back on the past and forward to the coming year. It was made the first month in our calendar year in 1 before which date many had regularly be the year with March. February is so c from the Latin verb februare, to purify; from Februa, the Roman festival of gen expiation and lustration, which was celebr during the latter part of this month.

F. R. B., Dayton, O. Which is most condu to the spiritual growth of a church, we or poverty?

We do not regard the question as fa stated. A very rich church is apt to bec self-sufficient and indifferent, while one tha extremely poor is shut out from many ave of spiritual usefulness. That clear-se preacher and author, Rev. Dr. Rober Nicoll, states the problem thus: "No d Christian churchmen would be more cheerf they could report uninterrupted outward p gress from year to year. If they could say they were supplied with funds for all er gencies; that communion rolls were consta lengthening, and that churches were b overcrowded, they would have more heart t forward. But there was a church of old boasted itself of such things, saying, 'I am r and increased with goods, and have nee nothing.' Yet in God's eyes that church wretched, and miserable, and poor, and bl and naked. There was another church, feeble that it seemed near dying, yet it divinely commended (Rev. 3: 8.)" Prob the best-conditioned church, in a spiri sense, is that which is neither rich nor p the hearts of whose members have not l hardened by wealth nor embittered by adver The humble church in moderate circumsta usually has a greater zeal for souls, a finer a for missions, a broader charity for suffer and lives nearer to Christ, than the ch which is filled with the gifts of prosperity.

Miscellaneous

Ella E., Fertile Valley, Can. Poor judgm on the part of a preacher, or any one else lend such trashy books to a boy.

Synod Hall, Edinburgh, Where the Conference Met

Archbishop of Canterbury

The World Missionary Conference

'T was a singularly fortunate choice that made the beautiful old Scottish capital city of Edinburgh, with all its venerable religious associations, the ene of the most important religious gathering of e twentieth century. For a long time past, it has en the conviction among those engaged in mis- nary enterprises that a decided improvement in ethods was urgently needed. Between $7,500,000 d $10,000,000 are expended annually by British ganizations in behalf of foreign missions, and the nited States has a still larger financial interest in e work, while other Chris- an countries in different rts of the world are lib- al sharers in the same terprise. With such vast terests at stake, both iritual and financial, it as inevitable that the time ould come when mission- y organizations should sire to meet together on mmon ground, to discuss ans and methods, to find way of co-operating ad- ntageously, systematical- and without friction, and r uniting forces wherever ssible so that all might ork together with the one reat end in view—the evan- elization of the world. In is aspect of the case, the nference is regarded as ne of the most momentous ver held in the history of hristian missions.

Two years were occupied preparation for the event. supreme effort was made assemble at the confer- nce — which lasted from une 14 to 23—practically ll of the ablest minds in issionary work, and to put nder tribute the best ources of information. ifteen committees shared his preparatory work, un- er the direction of eight ommissioners, the president-in-chief being Lord alfour of Burleigh, with a distinguished list of ssociates.

The service of welcome was held in St. Giles athedral and was really the opening of the con- erence. It was in this ancient church that John nox preached his vehement sermons, sometimes reaking in pieces the images in stone, and destroy- ng shrines. In this era of Christian missions, it as a strange sight to see the archbishop of Canterbury, the moderator of the general assembly of the Church of Scotland, the bishop of Birmingham, and the presidents of the Baptist Union, Congregationalists, Methodist bishops, Quakers, and others, with delegates of every hue of ecclesiastical dye, meeting in peace and good will for common counsel. St. Giles was indeed a veritable "Temple of Conciliation." The service had been printed, so that delegates of many different races and creeds had no difficulty in following it. Rev. Dr. Wallace Williamson preached the sermon, taking for his text: "The Field is the World." In the name of the Scottish Church he bade the delegates welcome. At 3 o'clock the conference held its first meeting in the United Free Assembly Hall, for the arrangement of business. Mr. John R. Mott was appointed chairman of the conference in committee, and Mr. I. H. Oldham, to whose organizing power the conference chiefly is indebted, was appointed secretary. At 5 o'clock in the afternoon university honors were conferred upon delegates by the senators of the Edinburgh University. The vice-chancelor principal, Sir William Turner, presided. Degrees were conferred on the following American delegates: Hon. D.D., Douglass Mackinsie, D.D., president of Hartford Theological Seminary, and Robert Elliott Speer, M.A., Presbyterian Secretary of Missions. The degree of LL.D. was conferred on General James A. Beaver, U. S. A., Judge of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania; Seth Low, formerly president of Columbia College University, New York, and John R. Mott, general secretary of the World Student Christian Federation.

Sir Walter Scott's Monument, Princes Street

It was an inspiring sight when Lord Balfour of Burleigh, president of the conference, took the chair at the first public meeting. On his right sat the Archbishop of Canterbury; the Moderator of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland; the Rev. Dr. McAdam Muir and Principal Whyte of the United Free Church. On the left, Lord Kinnaird, Mr. Robert Elliott Speer, of New York, and the Hon. Sir I. H. Kennaway, all sat in concord. The audience was thrilled when Lord Balfour arose and said: "I am charged with a message from the King." The delegates sprang to their feet. The message which Lord Balfour read was one of formal yet cordial greeting. It said in part:

His Majesty welcomes the prospect of this great representative gathering being held in one of the capitals of the United Kingdom, and expresses his earnest hope that the deliberations of the Conference may be guided by Divine wisdom, and may be a means of promoting unity among Christians, and of furthering the high and beneficent ends which the Conference has in view.

Lord Balfour in his opening address characterized the King's message as an invitation to fraternal co-operation and international peace which would find an echo in the hearts of men. The 1,200 members of the conference, he said, represented 160 different churches and organizations. It was a cause for sorrow that there should be so many different bodies, but an equal cause for joy and thankfulness that all are drawing together as never before.

The American Flag

TEXT: Ps. 60:4—"Thou hast given a banner to them that fear thee, that it may be displayed because of the truth."

HISTORY is full of banners, banners of every color and character, name and nature; banners of peace and war, treason and loyalty, liberty and bondage, justice and tyranny, joy and sorrow, life and death. Banners originated in war, serving as signals by which to direct men through the shock and storm of battle, guiding them in the whirlwind of the strife when their leaders were lost to view. As civilization advanced, the banner acquired other significance, gathering into its folds the quality of government and the spirit of the governed; finally becoming the insignia of nationality, so that to-day every nation has its banner, a flag floating for all it represents: its laws, its institutions, its ideas, ideals and civilization. When the three-colored flag waves to view, we see France, its history, spirit and government; when the Italian flag is unfurled, that means reconstructed Italy; when stripes of red, white and black appear, the strength and purpose, power and grandeur of Germany flash to view; when the crosses of St. Andrew and St. George on a red background set forth the banner of old England, we see not the banner merely, but the justice and fair play, the authority and civilization of the British Empire. Our nation also is bannered, and wherever its flag appears, the vision of mankind is quickened with the light of liberty. No other flag has been carried upon such a sublime mission, accomplished such triumphs for truth or awakened such joy and gladness amid scenes of despotic cruelty and oppression. The stars upon it have been to the downtrodden peoples of the earth like the bright morning star of heaven, and its stripes have gleamed with the very effulgence of morning light. Indeed, in the sacred emblazonry of this flag there is no ravenous lion, nor hissing serpent, nor fierce eagle, nor frowning castles, nor insignia of imperial authority; but always and everywhere the symbols of light.

Genesis of the Flag

That this is its language is demonstrated by its history. Our forefathers saw the possibility of such a flag when they fled from oppression beyond the sea. Their flesh had felt the chill of chains; their consciences had been fettered by royal cowards; their right to think had been denied; their desire to worship God according to the dictates of conscience was refused; and liberty to them was only a dim, distant and unrealized dream. Coming to the New World, they sought self-government, free speech, free hands, free thought, civil and religious freedom. Though unskilled in the diplomacy of nations, they were equal to the great emergency. If there were no Richelieus, nor Mazarins, nor Cecils, nor Chathams among them, there were men like old Themistocles, who knew how to raise a small State to greatness and glory! Confronted by the dangers of the New World, and pursued by the despotism of the Old, they fought and toiled and triumphed, increasing in numbers, growing in self-reliance, acquiring the power of self-government, laughing hardship and poverty to scorn, and exercising a faith which wrought in silent majesty. Out of that midnight of anguish and blood rose the Declaration of Independence, an instrument which kindled the star of hope above the cradle of the poor man's child, knighted all the sons of toil, illumined all the paths to fame, and made radiant the new era of liberty and equality.

The Heroes of the Flag

On the 4th of July, 1776, the Declaration of Independence was promulgated and confirmed. One year later, it was crowned with the Stars and Stripes. In 1777, on the 14th of June, the Congress of the confederated states assembled and ordained on original and independent flag, and lifted it full high before God and all men, as the standard of freedom and justice, liberty and nationality.

Then again, the patriotism and statesmanship of the men who originated this flag are sufficient guarantee of its strength, its splendor and its perpetuity. Who were these men? The Rutledges, the Pinckneys, the Jays, the Franklins, the Hamiltons, the Jeffersons and the Adamses, men of heroic courage and faith, men whose names shine as stars of the first magnitude in the world's history, men who took their lives in hand, with all their possessions, and consecrated them to the cause of liberty, giving to the world a declaration of facts and faith out of which evolved the Constitution, and which was crowned with this starry banner of freedom—these were the founders of this flag. Their thoughts kindled its stars; their principles painted its bars; and their spirit of patriotism quickened its symbols into immortal life; so that wherever this flag is unfurled, it is vocal with the thought and feeling of men "of whom the world is unworthy," founders of State, builders of empire, framers of an enduring Republic.

What the Flag Means

If it, then, be asked, "What is the history of this flag?" I answer: It is the history of the Republic, beginning with Plymouth Rock and sweeping through all the successive events and epochs down to the present moment; the history of an intelligent, patriotic, God-fearing and conquering people. It is luminous with the story of the Revolution, the thrilling deeds of the heroic men who struggled through those seven long years of want and woe and glory. Yes, and this flag means the very principles upon which the War of the Revolution was waged and won. It means just what Lexington and Concord, Bunker Hill and Valley Forge and Yorktown meant, in short, the uprising of the New World against the Old, the rising up of American democracy against European despotism, the establishment of the most momentous doctrine the world had ever known or has since known, viz., the sovereignty of the individual man!

A wondrous flag is this! Not an atom of crown in it, nor the shadow of a sceptre upon it, other than that held in the hand of the humblest citizen in the land, the sceptre of a citizenship more exalted and regal than the titled rights of kings. That this flag is more than a mere phenomenal speck in the history of nations, must be apparent to all who are familiar with the story of its struggles and its triumphs. It was scarcely planted upon the rock of nationality and lifted among the banners of the earth, when an effort was made to tear it down and trail it in the dust of humiliation and defeat. The full history of that rebellion against constitutional authority I will not open. It is a sacred memory. It is sealed with the best blood ever poured out as a libation upon the altar of liberty—American blood. We had been successful in three wars. We had wrested thirteen colonies from Great Britain and had conquered our place upon land and sea. We had added more than two million square miles to our national domain. Our population had increased from three to thirty million. We were in the midst of plenty. Our resources were boundless and the future seemed secure. Then all at once, into this peaceful atmosphere there came ominous clouds with fiery bolts full of death and desolation. Responding to a single cannon peal, the whole nation, as if it had been a trained army awaiting on its arms a given signal, rushed into a war which for sweep of havoc and story of horror rises to the front rank of bloody eminence. It was a war without precedent for the grandeur of its significance, the vastness of its resources and the stern tenacity of its combatants—a war in which conflicting principles were held with equal sincerity and defended with equal valor by the soldiers of the North and the South. That was the secret of the prolonged struggle, a war involving conscience and courage, and backed by the best fighting blood in the world.

The Flag in War and Peace

How glorious its origin; how splendid its triumphs; how divine its meaning; how magnificent its mission! In telling any part of its story we seem to boast. The simple statement of the bare facts written in its history sounds like a page from the Arabian Nights. Yet could the citizen of any country exalt his land with greater justification than we? What other civilized state stretches from ocean to ocean, with such an unparalleled and u challenged continental domain, with such Edens a El Dorados, with so vast a population, so free, intelligent, so patriotic, so industrious, so co tented? Why, even the great wars through whi our flag has passed have but quickened and dev oped our national prosperity. Like springs leapi from mountains of snow, melting into the ear moistening and fructifying the seed eager for t harvest, these mighty armies of the Revolution, t Civil War and the Spanish-American War, ma shaled for the well-being of the nation, have swift and noiselessly disappeared, and all that milita energy and discipline and skill streaming into thousand industries are as beneficent in peace they were terrible in war, and all over this migh land, the Northern hills and the blooming garde of the South, peace and plenty are at last the gua dian angels of national prosperity. And to-d there is no North nor South nor East nor We The spirit of sectionalism disappeared the day t grandsons of Lee and Grant marched shoulder shoulder in defending that flag against assaults Spanish despotism, and making it a bow of promi to the down-trodden minions of Cuba and the Ph ippines; and so, as never before, we are one natio and woe unto the nation or combination of natio that fails to take this fact into consideration in t settlement of national questions and the adjustme of international spheres of influence and power!

What We Owe to the Flag

And, my friends, what we are, all that we are, w owe to this glorious flag. And do you ask its mea ing? Well, it means all that our civilization mean that the schoolhouse is the bulwark of America liberty, the ballot box is the ark of American p triotism, and the home is the cornerstone of Ame ican civilization. It means protection to our citize at home and abroad, in St. Petersburg, Constant nople, Peking, Havana, Madrid, on every sea an every land, wherever it floats; it means that a archy and mobs are un-American; that dynamite the weapon of the coward, and that person an property, life and liberty shall be inviolate amon the people who gather beneath its glorious folds; means that free education is the fortress of Ame ican freedom, and that any assault upon our publi school system is an assault upon the nation; it mean the sanctity of our courts, that the scales of Justic shall stand between weakness and power, want an wealth, and guarantee simple equity to all; it mean the right of property possession; that the theory o confiscation is incongruous with the spirit of th Constitution, and that whatever progress is mad in the social world must be by evolution rather tha by revolution; it means national honesty, that ther shall be no knavery in politics, no graft in office, n betrayal of trust, nothing false or fictitious i finance; it means national unity, that we are al the citizens of one Union, North, East, South an West, and that, bound together in such an indissolu ble compact, we are invulnerable to any weapo formed against us; it means national hospitality that we welcome to our shores all refugees fro oppression, that our fireside is broad enough fo every man who loves the flag; it also means tha every gate should be locked against the representatives of anarchy and revolution, that every law should be enforced against perfidy and crime, that our institutions demand the respect and reverence of all, and that foreign instincts conflicting with these institutions should be left across the sea!

Arbitration and the Flag

It is likewise the symbol of peace, and means that the world has had it hard enough, that enough battles have been fought, enough lives have been sacrificed in the holocaust of war, enough property has been destroyed, enough nations have been bankrupted, enough homes have been blighted and ruined, enough millions have been spent in the cause of armament and murder, and enough burden has been placed upon the shoulders of impoverished toil. It means that the time has come for peace, that in the evolution of Christian civilization the pen is at last mightier than the sword, and that it is better to djust international difficulties by bitration than by the bloody horrors war. This is the meaning of our g, and as these wondrous truths sh forth from its stars and stripes, mocracy rises higher and higher ong the governments of the earth, d more and more earth's teeming illions find in the story of this flag e secret of human progress and the timate realization of human hope.

And so, God hath given unto us a nner "that it may be displayed ecause of the truth." The time has ne when it is our duty as a nation display this flag among the nations the earth. It is not enough that it displayed in our midst, that it float om school and tower and hut and lace as the symbol of our power at me. It must he restored to its place on the sea, where it once repreented not only our political but our mmercial ascendency among the naons of the earth. It is a sad comment lleed upon our national pride and wer, that so small a percentage of r foreign trade is being carried at e present time in American vessels, der the American flag. It is a sad flection upon our wisdom as a nation at with the widening sweep of our tional influence, which is rapidly circling the earth, with the apbaching completion of that miracle engineering skill, the Panama nal, soon to become a highway conecting the Atlantic and Pacific, are so ill prepared to utilize this eat advantage, not only to our civil lt military strength and safety as a tion. Instead of pouring countless illions of treasure into men-ofwar, ilding Dreadnoughts with which to lice the seas, the time is at hand en our merchant marine should be couraged, restored and protected, king it possible for the shipping of merican commerce in vessels built in merican shipyards, by American rkmen, manned by American seamen, and floating under the American g! The great contest of the future ll not be that of war, hut rather the aceful rivalries of trade. In this mmercial conflict we can only hope maintain our place and win fresh rels in the great commercial rivry, as we protect our maritime erests against the unjust discrimination of foreign shipping trusts and ke it possible for the American nufacturer and merchant to ship eir products in American vessels, d thus to engage in the struggle of tions, beneath the inspiration, guidce and protection of the American g. That flag which yesterday was ited in its influence and power, has ddenly been lifted into an infinitude world-wide influence. It has been ovidentially exalted, until its stars ke effulgent the dim and distant rts of the earth. Then let us upld it! Let us make it more than a la day banner. Let it float as the mbol of national authority and wer, as the insignia of righteousss, yea, the inspiration of liberty and stice; and because of the truth which represents, the immortal principles itten in its historic folds, let it be played at home and abroad as the rbinger of peace and the prophecy the coming Parliament of man!

SUPERSTITION AND ST. SWITHIN

By Rev. J. M. FARRAR, D.D.*

SUPERSTITION is a long word. You cannot cut it with your knife, but if you have a keen edge on your brain you can divide it into two words. The first half is the Latin word "super," meaning over, and the second half is "stare," meaning to stand. Superstition is something that has been left to stand over. If a box came to you and you did not know it was candy you might let it stand over until it spoiled. Superstition is a truth that people do not understand and let stand over until it spoils. Spoiled truth is superstition.

ST. SWITHIN was Bishop of Winchester. Many superstitions are mixed with his name and fame. He died in 862. When dying, he requested that his body be buried in the churchyard. The legend says that one hundred years afterward, when the monks on July 15 took up his body to deposit it in the Cathedral, they were delayed by a violent rain. The reason for the rain was not explained and was left to "stand over" until it became a superstition. People came to believe that the rain was sent to prevent the monks from taking his body from the place where he wanted it to rest. There are foolish and superstitious people to-day who say if it rains on St. Swithin's Day, July 15, it will rain for forty days. Your teacher will explain to you that we expect considerable rain about July 15, at what is called the "summer solstice." If the monks had known the rain was the result of God's laws, they would have waited until the rain was over before lifting the body. Then there would have been no superstition about it.

THIS year St. Swithin's Day comes on Friday. Here we have another superstition. Some time in the past something happened on Friday. It was not explained, but was left over until it spoiled, or became a superstition. It is a sin to injure Friday, as it has been a great day in our history. America was discovered on Friday. The Mayflower landed at shore on Friday. The Declaration of Independence was signed on Friday, and George Washington was born on Friday. It is a sin and a shame to leave some facts "standing over" until they spoil and leave their odor to spoil the reputation of a good day.

Let me give you one rule for destroying superstition. It is the rule of God. Our God rules all things; he rules "13" and "Friday." When we "knock wood" we are striking at the rule of God. The Greek word, superstition, in our text, means "reverence of demons." When you lose the rule of God you are in danger of taking the rule of demons. Superstition is the rule of demons. If you are tempted to be superstitious just say: "It is God's '13.' It is God's 'Friday.'" God, like salt, cures things that are left over to decay.

DO you really want a story about superstition? Here it is:

"Listen," said Ned, as he stood in the farmhouse door with Uncle Horace.

It was an early autumn morning. Across the field, clear and cheery, sounded once and again the whistle of a quail.

"Do you hear that?" asked Ned; "that is an old quail who has raised her family in the north pasture this summer. "Hear them now!" as the call rang out again in the quiet air.

"If you were a French instead of an American boy," said Uncle Horace, "you would have a superstition about the quail."

"Why?"

"Because in France they think, or at least say, that the number of calls of the quail foretells the price of wheat." They think that if the quail calls twice without resting, the farmers need expect but two francs (about forty cents) a bushel for their wheat; but if he calls four times it will be twice that."

"How very odd! Do you believe it?"

UNCLE HORACE laughed. "I don't, Ned, any more than I believe that the white rooster crowing so loud on the fence there is a bird of 'ill omen.'"

"Surely no one thinks that," protested Ned.

"Yes, indeed, in many parts of Saxony the peasants will not raise chickens at all, even though they are poor and could sell the eggs at a good price; because, as I have said, they call the cock the 'bird of ill omen.'"

"Is not that what they call a superstition?" asked Ned.

"Yes, some fact they did not understand was left over to spoil."

"Let me tell you a pretty name the Swedish people have for the turtle dove."

"What is the name, Uncle?"

"They call it 'God's bird,' because God used it to help Noah out of the ark.

"That is certainly a very pretty name," said Ned. "Now I am going to the barn to get some wheat to feed God's birds."

"Yes," said Ned's mother, who from the dining room had been listening to Ned and his uncle, "if you put God into your thought and into your stories there will be no superstitions."

* Pastor First Ref'd Ch., Brooklyn, N.Y. TEXT: "Their own superstition." Acts 25:19.

From Fair Avoca's Vale

THE Rev. J. M. Robinson, an Irish Episcopal clergyman, is now visiting the United States. His home parish is one known all over the world—the celebrated "Vale of Avoca," which Moore chose as the theme of one of his sweetest songs. Pastor Robinson's mission here is to enlist the sympathy of some warm-hearted American to save a poor parish where the people are totally unable to help themselves, to save it from practical extinction, the result of causes which have come about in the political and economic changes of the country.

"I have been rector of Avoca for twenty-five years," he said. "The parish is really made up of three parishes, and formerly had four clergymen. It covers an area of sixty square miles and embraces the celebrated Vale as well as some of the mountainous parts of Wicklow. The disendowment of the Church, the failure of the Avoca copper mines, and now the sale of the landlord interest, have all worked so disastrously on the finances of this already poor parish, that the work of God has been crippled. One of the three parishes—Conary—in its poorest part, has had its whole income, all that went to keep up church and school, swept away, and no means is forthcoming for carrying on the Gospel work in the future. In the past, the work in this district has been very successful. A new chancel was lately added to the church through means given by the Lord Primate of all Ireland, and the school has acquitted itself creditably. Both these branches are now totally without support unless some benefactor undertakes the work.

"The sale of estates in Ireland has taken a great amount of help from many churches," he added. "The landlord at Conary, who formerly gave an annual sum to work church and school, has sold the estate and this aid is lost. A society also assisted with funds, but owing to bad times, its aid is not now forthcoming. Private friends who contributed have died and the failure of the copper mines and other causes have all added to the misfortunes of the parish. The rector finds himself, after twenty-five years of labor, with no funds with which to continue this good work. It was he who built the church, school and residence, but now he has not got a fraction of income from the parish, the whole endowment of his big union of parishes being a miserable sum equal to $23 a year.

Pastor Robinson's is the only church of any kind in the Conary district in which the Catholics and Protestants are about equally divided. His object in coming to the United States is to seek some one who, out of love to God's work and for the lasting good of this church and school and the poor people concerned, would give a sum of $20,000 to be invested so that the work of church and school can be carried on for all future time.

"What better memorial could any Christian ask than this?" Mr. Robinson asked.

Pastor Robinson will be pleased to answer any inquiries made by any readers of this journal who may be interested in the saving of this Protestant parish work in the beautiful "Vale of Avoca." His address is Rev. J. M. Robinson, the Rectory, Vale of Avoca, Woodenbridge, County Wicklow, Ireland.

"THE ANGELS OF THE GRASS"

MY heart can feel, but feeble words, alas,
Have not the depth and fulness to express
My height of joy and my deep thankfulness
To him whose vivid fancy brought to pass
That rare conceit—"The angels of the grass."
It is as if some fairy sorceress
A picture wrought with unexampled stress;
Or scattered gems into a sea of glass.

Such be the dainty flowers then to me!
The gentle ones with deeply-tender eyes!
Their tones I hear, their lustrous wings I see;
And I am filled with rapture and surprise!
My heart accepts the figured mystery
That flowers are angels, dwelling in disguise!

It Was a Lightning Convention

From Our Special Correspondent

A LIGHTNING convention, at which one hundred lady delegates spoke at the rate of one speaker per minute met in Glasgow, Scotland, June 3-10. Two hundred and thirty women from the United States crossed the Atlantic Ocean to attend it, and other women came long distances—from Australia, New Zealand, India, Egypt, Madagascar, Syria, South Africa, Japan, China, Korea, Norway, Sweden, Holland, Germany, Switzerland, Canada, England and Scotland. The great audiences completely filled the different places of meeting: The Town Hall, the John Street United Free Church and St. Andrew's Hall.

On June 5, one hundred and twenty-five pulpits in Glasgow were filled by the delegates. Surely on that day gospel temperance had its say.

Probably the most picturesque meeting of the convention was the children's demonstration. Several thousand children marched in procession to the Town Hall flying banners and accompanied by bands of bagpipers and fifers in Highland garb. In the hall there was a chorus of five hundred children to lead in the singing, and when all in the hall were singing, great was the sound thereof. The children vociferously cheered those who addressed them. All of which recalled the saying: 'Tremble, King Alcohol, we shall grow up."

Another picturesque session of the convention was the evening devoted to the Young People's branch, usually spoken of as the "Y's." There was a large chorus of young ladies, accompanied by twenty-five or more young lady violinists. The speeches were made by young ladies, among whom was Lady Dorothy Howard, the daughter of the Countess of Carlisle. She said she rejoiced in the fact that her mother had from her childhood given her a temperance training. A superb white satin banner was awarded to the "Y's" of Japan for having the largest proportion of increase in membership during the last three years.

The last session of the evening was novel and most interesting. One hundred speeches of one minute each were made by one hundred women. Here are a few samples: "Why don't you shut up the liquor, instead of shutting up my husband?" asked a woman in New Zealand, who was accompanying a policeman taking her husband to jail. "American Saloon" was the sign I saw in large letters on a saloon in Naples. Looking in I saw two barmaids, and I said in a low voice: 'It is not so, we do not have barmaids in American saloons, and may never have them. And may they soon disappe from saloons in every part of the world.'" Anoth woman said: "I am here to tell you that Scotland going dry." At this there was a burst of vocif ous laughter and much applause.

The Countess of Carlisle

The convention stood for prohibition of the ma ufacture and sale of alcoholic liquor for bevera purposes; the enfranchisement of the women of nations as a measure to suppress the liquor traff food reform as a preventive and cure for ineb ety; active opposition against all forms of State municipal regulation of vice; the recognition of equal standard of morality for man and woman; t name White Slave Traffic to be changed to Wome Slave Traffic, so as to include colored races; pea and arbitration instead of war; campaigns of ed cation for temperance.

A special resolution was passed against the s of opium and intoxicants to native races. Also resolution was passed asking that the Conference Nations at the Hague use its influence to i duce Great Britain to release opium treaties wi China, and thus make it possible for the Chinese liberate their country from the opium curse.

Another special resolution was passed pledgi loyalty to the observance of World's Temperan Sunday on the date named by the Internation Lesson Committee.

The holding of the great convention should be decided benefit to Glasgow, for out of it should co uplift for the drunken women who are to be se standing on street corners in idle, listless attitud ragged and forlorn, and whose cries are to be hea in the streets at all hours of the night. Some of t delegates of the convention held meetings amo them, and quite a number were desirous of givi up drink. The W. C. T. U. of Glasgow is worki bravely for these women and the convention w bring them much re-enforcement.

The officers elected by the convention were pre dent, the Countess of Carlisle; vice-president, Mi Lilian M. N. Stevens, of the United States; secr taries, Miss Agnes E. Stack and Miss Anna Gordon; treasurer, Mrs. Mary E. Sanderson, Canada.

The Story of the Light

By MILDRED CARLTON SHINN

THE Woman's Interdenominational Missionary Union of the District of Columbia has been asked by hundreds of Sunday School workers who sojourned in Washington a few weeks since, to give the public the story of the beautiful evangelistic electric light, which made so profound an impression on the eve of the great Sunday School Convention.

Copyrighted

The Great White Mission Light in Washington

The Light consists of a star surmounting the words "Jesus, the Light of the World." The star is seven feet from tip to tip and flashes. The letters of the word "Jesus" are five feet in height and burn steadily, while the letters in the other words, "The Light of the World," which are placed below the word "Jesus," are forty inches in height and flash. The entire sign is twenty-three feet high and ninety feet long, and is erected on the top of the Central Union Mission, six stories high, just off Pennsylvania Avenue at the junction of Seventh Street. The immense size of the letters, coupled with their pure whiteness, makes them easily legible from a great distance. When lighted at night they are beautiful in effect and outrank all the other electric displays on the avenue.

The idea originated in the Woman's Interdenominational Missionary Union, which includes women from all the Protestant churches of the city. The plan determined upon by these women was to present the matter to the Sunday School children of the entire city, and urge them to contribute by mites the entire cost of the enterprise, and to take to themselves the credit and glory of emblazoning in letters of dazzling light the great truth that Jesus is the light of the world.

These women made a thorough canvass of all the Sunday Schools. From all sides the response was hearty and joyous; all gladly brought their gifts, especially the small and mission schools. Seventy-five Sunday Schools, Endeavor and Junior Societies, together with individual gifts, made it possible for this electric witness to be raised successfully and to flash out its great truth the night before the meeting of the World's International Sunday School Convention, absolutely free of debt and with enough in bank for maintenance.

When the conclave of wise men gathered from all nations, they were greeted by a flashing star of great brilliance, calling attention to one of the leading truths of the Christian religion. They marveled at its simplicity and beauty. It was looked at by thousands the first night and called forth strong expressions of delight. Coming from the White House, all beholders day and night are confronted by the sign, and forced to read the message it bears. Many are testifying to the drawing power of these divine words. It was held in reverence by the workmen who wrought upon it. It is the only sign of its kind in the world.

One touching gift came from a little orphan, eight-year-old Master Douglas Seely, who brought forty cents in pennies, nickels and dimes—all that his mite box contained—earned by distributing circulars evenings after school. He said to his blind grandmother, a sweet Gospel singer: "I want to give it all to the Light." Mrs. Seely sang at the dedication, "Jesus, the Light of the World," while Douglas sat on the rostrum, the happiest boy in Washington. Another gift came from the little colored children in Queen's Court, one of the worst alleys in the city. There were many individual gifts ranging from one to fifty dollars, but who will not say that these two were greatest, for they were not given from abundance but were their all. The children of the city claim an ownership in the sign and look upon it with joy.

The Mission itself has felt a religious influence never before experienced. Rev. J. Henning Nelm, of the Church of the Ascension, in opening the dedicatory exercises said to the Christian women: "You have put the name of Jesus where those must see it who never go to church. Still and quick the name of Jesus shines out of the darkness and must carry the message 'I am the Light of the World.'"

Mr. O. B. Brown, president of t Board of Directors, said: "Washingt has the distinction of being the pione in the installation of electricity f purposes that tell of something high than business and more elevating th commerce." Ministers from the Met odist, Baptist, Lutheran, Presbyteri and Christian Churches added to t interest of the occasion and made one long to be remembered. Sund Schools all over the city are taking the words of Superintendent Congw of the Vermont Avenue Christian Su day School: "I hope that every Sund School will become a live wire to ke the message burning. Every such li wire will prove a shock to the devil

Such is the story of the Light. Tl committee sent forth were doub blessed; they found the windows heaven open and showers of blessin poured forth.

THE BOTTOM OF THE WELL

By J. Bradley Vandaworker

ELISHA BIDDLE, bending under the weight of two pails of foaming milk, paused half way tween the cowsheds and the house. "Chriss!" he sharply called to the utch farm hand in the barn door, 've got to clean out the well on the her place to-day. Throw the single rness on the bay mare before you me to breakfast, and be quick about

I want to get through before the mpkinses move in—they'll be there out ten."

The other place referred to was a ng tenantless forty-acre farm a ile and a quarter down the road. A ight relaxation of his drawn features as the only outward sign of Biddle's tisfaction in securing a tenant.

Twenty years ago last fall Elisha iddle had wooed and wed the rosy-eeked Hannah. At once they set up ousekeeping on an eighty-acre patch ought with money he had earned as a rm hand. Always industrious he ved, miserly, adding gradually a few res as the opportunity offered.

On this particular morning everying had gone wrong. First the spring lf had refused to take its breakfast om a pail with such obstinacy that e milk was spilled. Next, one of the ws had kicked him, and another had vitched her tail in his eyes, a thing casperating to a high-strung man. s a finisher his boot caught on the tchen steps, tearing off the heel.

Half stumbling through the door he rowled, "Breakfast ready?"

"In just a minute," smiled Hannah. "It's always late when I've got a big ay's work ahead," he grumbled, going to the pantry with the milk.

"'Lisha," she pleasantly called after m, "you can sit right down as soon s you wash your hands. I'll pour you cup of coffee and you can begin on e potatoes."

"Do you s'pose I'm goin' to make a eal on potatoes?" he exclaimed, comg out to the sink and splashing a pperful of water into the washasin. "How long do you think I uld work on that kind of a diet?"

"I'm sorry, 'Lisha, but I was delayed mite with lookin' after Old Speckle—e's stolen her nest and come off with urteen chicks."

"You're always delayed when I'm in hurry to get to work."

Turning she faced him, out of paence.

"'Lisha Biddle, I've stood your faultnding and growling about as long as m goin' to! Land sakes, I might as ell live with a brute."

With his hand on the towel he opped, surprised. Hannah had never sed such words before. He should ave to be firm.

"If you couldn't get up in time why idn't you say so last night! The well's ot to be cleaned or the Simpkinses on't stay."

"If you're in such a hurry," she ashed, "why don't you go 'long!"

"All right, Hannah," he stammered, umbfounded. In the doorway he dded, "I don't care if I never come ack!"

"Good riddance," she flung after im. "You're getting so cross and ean no one can live with you."

In the barn door he met Chriss. Hurry up and get your breakfast," e ordered. "I'll hitch up." Entering, e muttered, "'Tain't so! I ain't ean; and I ain't no brute neither."

In contradiction the bay mare ringed when he came into her stall. locking one ear she kept an eye on im.

"No, I ain't mean," he grumbled a oment later backing the horse into he shafts. As he snapped the lines o the bit he snarled, "It's a lie!"

Throwing a bucket with a rope behind the seat, he got into the buggy to wait for his hired man.

Chriss soon climbed gingerly beside him.

"What's that bundle?"

"Lunch," answered the Dutchman, handing it over. "Mrs. Biddle thought you vould hungry get."

Taking the package he threw it to the shepherd dog, cut the horse with the whip and drove across the fields toward the other place.

As they neared the house he asked, "Chriss, have you ever been to the bottom of a well?"

"Nein."

"You ain't afraid to go down, are you?"

"If dey stoned be."

"This one is stoned," scowled Biddle, eyeing his help disgustedly.

"Vonce I seen a vell cave in. Dey never got de man oudt until he vas deadt."

"You Dutchmen," he said pulling up, "are all cowards. I'll never hire another."

"Jess, sir," nodded Chriss.

Silently they pumped out the four feet of water. Biddle was morose; his mind troubled by the words Hannah had flung at him. Once he muttered aloud, "I ain't neither—I shan't go back."

"Vawt?" asked Chriss, looking up.

"Get hold there and tear away the rotten curb," he snapped.

Probably the Simpkinses would board him and be glad of the chance to make a few extra dollars.

"Now," he ordered as soon as the curbing was removed, "go down in the well and clean out the bottom."

Peering down Chriss hesitated.

"Get out of the way," snarled Biddle, "I'll do it myself. We'll get done sooner."

Twisting a leg around the wooden pump, he slid down the twelve-foot tubing. About half way his foot struck the plug, loose in the vent, knocking it out."

"Hang it!" he exclaimed, "now I'll have to put it in again."

But by the time the man let down the shovel his mind was in a tumult over the first quarrel with Hannah—not that he had never vented his disagreeableness on her before, but this was the first time she had turned on him, and it always takes two to make a quarrel—he forgot the plug, scraping it up with the frogs, sticks and dirty mud, which went up as fast as Chriss could empty and let down the bucket.

Only a tiny stream, smaller than a pencil, trickled in near the bottom.

"A dozen head of stock could drink this well dry," thought Biddle. "As soon as the seeding is done, it'll have to go deeper, if I want to keep the Simpkinses on the place."

The last bucketful of muck had gone up. Waiting for the rope to come down for the shovel he stood examining the stones with critical eye.

Yes, there was a loose one.

Reaching with his shovel he attempted to push it back. With no warning it rolled from its place.

Dodging the stone, Biddle watched it hit the mud. The noise sounded like the hiss of "Cross!" He shuddered, then grew livid.

A stone above was moving!

He heard it grumble "Mean, mean!"

"'Lisha stopped, surprised . . . Hannah never used such words before"

Another, loosened by the fall of the first, ground its neighbor free. Then several appeared to creep toward him, muttering "Mean, mean!"

A shadow shut out the light. He looked up to see the earth caving from the top. Instantly his ears were filled with the hideous crunch and grind of the tomb around him. God! the whole mass was tumbling toward him, mocking, grinning, hissing.

With a cry of horror he threw up an arm to guard his head.

One last crunch of dirt and stones grinding together and Biddle was fastened against the pump tubing.

The very earth he had always coveted crowded the stones against him with devilish greed.

But strange and unaccountable as it may seem the stones which held him were wedged against each other in such a way as to prevent their own weight, and that of the dirt, from entirely crushing the life out of him, for a time at least.

Spitting the dirt from his mouth he blinked his eyes. All was dark. Though unable to turn his head to the right or the left he guessed there must be the space of a cubic foot in front of his face. He speculated on how long this bit of air would keep the breath of life in his body.

"Hannah," he half sobbed.

The sound of his voice aroused him to action.

Loudly he called to Chriss. Then listened.

No answer.

Again and again he repeated the attempt with like result.

Buried alive not ten feet from help and unable to make himself heard!

Then an amazing thing happened that set his heart beating high with hope. As plainly as could be, he heard Chriss speak to the mare.

The vent! The plug was out of the vent. His left ear was pressed hard over the vent hole. The pump tubing acted as a speaking tube. What had seemed a miracle he now understood to be quite simple. With all his might he tried to turn his mouth to the vent, but failed. The effort cost him the painful laceration of the right side of his head.

Then he heard Chriss backing the mare into the buggy.

Heavens! the man was getting ready to drive away.

Long and loudly Biddle screamed.

For answer, out of the darkness echoed his own voice.

The stones settled an inch or two. In the grind they muttered "Brute, brute!" close to his ear. He shrieked in the agony of a premature grave until exhausted.

Then came faintly the crack of the whip and "Get up," followed by the sound of the buggy wheels rattling away.

"Deserted!" Biddle ground between his teeth. Was he, after all, a brute, and such a mean brute that even his hired man could leave him without attempting his rescue?

His left arm was bent over his head. With all his might he tried to move it, but the stones cruelly held it as in a vise. The right arm was bent at the elbow and the hand bruised against his side. In a short time he began to suffer from the uncomfortableness of his position.

He had told Hannah that he did not care if he never came back. What if he never should?

It was a just punishment for a rash threat he regretted.

His left arm began to tingle as the blood ran out of it. Then the cold stones and damp earth aroused his rheumatism to torture.

Had Chriss gone to Nashville for help? The thought gave him new hope. Two miles there and back! The mare could make it in ten minutes each way—that would be twenty. Probably take ten more to get men and shovels. Could he breathe the same air over and over for thirty minutes! Besides, there was the time required to dig him out—half a day or more.

Perhaps the interstices among the stones were not all filled with dirt, but some with air!

Then he tried to calculate. Had Chriss been gone thirty minutes? Yes, he was sure it was much longer. Hannah must be starting dinner now. He could imagine her occasionally glancing out of the window, God bless her, to see if he was coming across the fields.

He sniffed the air. It was heavy.

Hannah had called him a brute. What was the opinion of the men of Nashville?

He could not remember one instance where he had gone out of his way to

A City's Fair Fame

A CITY should be jealous of its fair fame. When the sensational reports of the existence of an organized "White Slave" traffic in New York were widely published some time ago, the whole country was shocked at the nature of the charges then made with such detail and circumstance that they had the similitude of truth itself. Our metropolis was pictured as a modern Babylon, where the annual tribute to vice was paid with a vengeance; where no young girl was safe, and where organized bands of procurers of the worst type flourished under political protection. This hideous fiction of a depraved imagination has been thoroughly exposed by the report of the Special Grand Jury, headed by John D. Rockefeller, Jr., which was presented to the General Sessions Court a few days ago. That report says:

We have found no evidence of the existence in the County of New York of any organization or organizations, incorporated or otherwise, engaged as such in the traffic in women for immoral purposes, nor have we found evidence of an organized traffic in women for immoral purposes.

This complete refutation of the libel on New York, representing as it does the net result of six months' painstaking investigation, is supplemented and clinched by the confession of the principal author of the slanders, who, when called before the Grand Jurors, admitted under oath that his printed charges were deceiving and exaggerated and that he had "no evidence—not even hearsay"—to support them. Judge O'Sullivan justly characterized them as "the most scandalous attack ever made upon the city."

New York is a great cosmopolitan centre, and it has to contend with and regulate the evils that are common to a mixed population. But the present inquiry has demonstrated that, as capital cities go, it deserves to be ranked as fairly moral. Indeed, the court declared it the cleanest of all great cities. To picture it as a sink of iniquity, a modern Sodom, where all the vices of the world are practised unhindered, is the reverse of the truth. Vice exists, but in a sporadic form. The day of criminal gangs and "red lights" and "cadets" is passed. Under the present municipal system, a constant warfare is waged against immorality in every form, just as it is waged against criminals generally. The Grand Jury appreciates this and urges still greater energy in law enforcement, with a view to putting up new safeguards in the interest of morality. A special recommendation is for the appointment of a commission to study the laws dealing with the social evil in the leading cities here and abroad, for the purpose of adopting the best and most effective methods of treatment here. Meanwhile the Special Grand Jury is entitled to the thanks of the community for its vindication of the fair fame of New York, and its unsparing exposure of the mercenaries who slandered it to make a cheap sensation.

What Congress Has Accomplished

AMONG the important measures passed during the first session of the Sixty-first Congress, just closed, are the following:

The railroad bill, extending the regulative power of the government over common carriers by rail; the establishment of postal savings banks; the creation of a commission to inquire into stock and bond issues of railroads to ascertain if they have been watered and recommending remedial legislation; the creation of a bureau of mines and mining; admission of Arizona and New Mexico into the Union as States; to withdraw certain classes of public lands from entry in pursuance of the national conservation policy; increase in the navy by construction of two first-class battleships, four torpedo boats and other craft.

These are all distinctly administration measures. Other bills recommended by the President and which also passed, were these:

Publicity of campaign contributions; further perfection of the laws in regard to the use of safety appliances on railroads; a commission to obtain facts on which the Federal departments may be reorganized in the interest of economy; issue of $20,000,000 certificates for the completion of irrigation projects; an appropriation of $250,000, to enable the tariff board to ascertain the difference in the cost of production in articles at home and abroad as the basis of future tariff revision.

Among the few important measures which failed to pass this session were the bill creating a national bureau of public health; the bill to regulate stock and bond issues, and measures in regard to injunctions and the merchant marine. Over the first of these there has been a bitter fight between the various medical schools. The others will doubtless come up again at a future time. Nearly a score of other measures, of more or less public moment, were passed during the session, which, though not so long nor so important as many previous Congresses, has nevertheless made a good record for legislation of a substantial character.

Planning World-Conquest

IT was a glorious theme that occupied the attention of the World Missionary Conference, which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD correspondent graphically describes on another page. Christianity's ablest leaders were assembled to plan the mightiest of campaigns—for the conquest of the world. In all that great gathering, there was not a single note of dissent or discouragement. Commanders of the various brigades of the Army of the Cross in many lands told how the ancient strongholds of heathenism and idolatry are crumbling, and how the multitudes are being drawn by the power of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. It was shown, with all the power of instantaneous conviction, that if the missionary forces of Christianity could be mobilized so that they could work harmoniously, with a common impulse, like an army under one great leader, nothing could withstand them. In a single generation, the goal would be won; the Great Commission would be fulfilled, and the nations of the earth would all have the Gospel preached to them as Christ commanded. This problem of missionary co-operation is the key-note of the campaign. There are minor problems, it is true; but none vital, like this. Hence, laying aside all petty differences, the churches and missionary organizations should run up the motto "Unite and Conquer!" as their watchword in the coming struggle.

Study Camps

TO the thoughtful mind, the development of what may be called "the summer camp school" is a most interesting one. Scarcely a beach or lake or forest is without its summer colony for study. Directed by high authorities in the educational world, you may go so far in some of these out-door schoolrooms as to cover in two or three months by hard work a whole year of a college curriculum. But most of the school camps expect only an hour or two of study on the part of each member. Boys or girls who have an "exam" to "make up"; or who wish to learn a foreign language in preparation for a year abroad; or who must master Italian or German in order to sing the songs of those nations, are in large numbers in these summer camps. Thousands of young people are trailing through fields and woods, learning the fascinating secrets of birds or flower. Some camps are luxuriously equipped and sheltered beneath tight roofs. Others are canvas-covered, served only by the campers themselves, and modest in cost. But an enormous proportion of our youthful population is thus happily, and, we believe, wholesomely established this summer in the great out-of-doors, breathing in the health and joy that come with pure air and high associations.

The People's Savings

AFTER about thirty years of recommendations from various heads of the Post Office Department and debate with no result by Congress, a bill has been passed providing for the creation of a postal savings bank system. Congress seemed to have little interest in the present measure and it would probably have been lost sight of altogether had not President Taft put the full weight of the administration behind it and forced it through. As a result of the President's efforts we shall have started in about sixty days a savings bank department conducted under government auspices, and which cannot fail even in the time of the worst panic. Such a system has been needed for years, especially to accommodate large districts which are without proper facilities for the deposit of savings and had no prospect of seeing any such established.

A great many banks all over the country have been opposed to the measure, fearing it would make serious inroads on the business which they had built up. Their alarm, however, was needless. The postal savings bank is not intended to be a place of deposit for people who have large sums and w live in communities where banks are numerous. is designed primarily to provide a place of depos for those people who have a small hoard of savin and who have relied on the proverbial stocking as place of security, and who have been afraid of ban because they were acquainted only with the sma "wildcat" variety. These people will readily p their savings into the care of Uncle Sam, and it doubtful if the regular savings bank business w be appreciably affected to its disadvantage. O may start an account with one dollar, but cann have more than five hundred in the post office at a one time. Not more than one hundred dollars c be deposited in any one month.

The number of people who have been their ov bankers is very large. As a result of this bill, se eral millions which have been hidden away will put to work in the world, thus helping business ge erally and consequently the regular banks.

The Dollar Gown

IN one of the great High Schools of New Yo City, twenty-seven girls in a class of two hundr and forty have just distinguished themselves l graduating in gowns the materials of which co only a dollar each. Among their classmates we some whose gowns cost from $50 upward, but it w said that the dollar gowns looked every whit dainty as their more luxurious rivals, and cou not be distinguished by the committee delegated discriminate between them. This incident is on one of many that indicate a radical reform in t matter of commencement costumes for girls. T elegance and elaboration of these gowns duri recent years were alarming thoughtful observer but in many of our High Schools warnings ha been issued on the subject, while at Wellesley, Bry Mawr, Mount Holyoke and other colleges, stringe rules were made this year concerning the cost graduating gowns. At Bryn Mawr, the specific tions were most minute, the very height of ea collar and character of each tie being indicate This movement for economy among our girls is encouraging sign of the times.

Oberammergau Passion Play

A HUNDRED years ago a great calamity came upon the village of Oberammergau, Bavaria, which made a profound impression upon e inhabitants, and they vowed to God that if he ould make an end to their distress they would nder greater devotion to him and increased ser- e in the establishment of his kingdom; and as a eans to this end they instituted the Passion Play imitation of the mystery plays of the Church in e Middle Ages. These mystery plays, in earlier nes, were educational. Very few could read, many the noblemen were unable to sign their names, and nply made their mark. The people who in- tuted the Passion Play at Oberammergau had the ea of education and spiritual growth in view. uring the Passion Play period the little village of berammergau is crowded with people from almost the nations of the earth. It is estimated that at ast two hundred thousand people this year will ve visited the village to see the play. All those o take part in the actual production, numbering ven hundred people, are natives of the village. lmi Morse many years ago undertook to put the ssion Play on the stage in this country, in imita- n of the original play; but his attempt was a mplete failure, as the people hooted the idea as the nit of irreverence. The ort to give the play in nada met with the same stant and persistent hos- ity; but the people in the tle village over the sea not count the play ir- verent, neither do the ousands of visitors who me to witness it con- der it so. Its effect upon e performers and upon e inhabitants of the vil- ge is morally and spirit- lly beneficial; for as ey have one year in hich they act the life of hrist on the stage, the ne years between the ays are devoted to living hrist. In their acting d in their every-day liv- g they illustrate the one- ss of purpose which the ostle expressed in these rds:

For I determined not to know thing among you, save Jesus rist, and him crucified. (I. Cor. 2.)

Dustless Ash-Cart

Mrs. Flora Speigelberg, New York, has invented sanitary cover for city h-carts which has just en successfully tested by e Street Cleaning Department of New York. A gular department vehicle was covered with one these new devices, giving it the appearance of a ge chafing dish. The cover has two openings, one the side near the seat, and the other at the rear the cart. The method of filling the cart is to t the lid at the side and empty the refuse. The vering is immediately lowered, leaving little op- rtunity for ashes and pulverized substances to cape. Fortunately the new device does not pre- nt the rapid unloading of the carts at the dump- g place. This woman inventor has made another ntribution to the health of the great city. The osaic dispensation enjoined the most rigid sani- ry regulations. The greatest care was required the disposition of the refuse.

And he shall put off his garments, and put on other garments, d carry forth the ashes without the camp into a clean place. ev. 6:11.)

Sleepless Man

There is a report from Hackettstown, N. J., that lonzo Wire, the former chief of police of that place, ter twenty years of an almost sleepless life, had ssed to his long home. About thirty years ago, r. Wire while working as a farmhand was driving team of horses during a thunderstorm, when they ere struck by lightning and the driver was badly unned and deafened. After a while insomnia veloped. He became a night watchman for the ackawanna Railroad. After watching all night he ould find it impossible to sleep in the daytime. He ould merely recline on a couch and was not able to close his eyes in sleep, and it is asserted that he dragged through this score of weary years sleeping almost none of the time. We are inclined to question the authenticity of the report that he did not sleep at all during those twenty years. We cannot see how any mortal could exist without rest to the brain and nervous system, which the "sweet restorer" gives. But there was evidently enough insomnia in his life to make his case unlike almost any other that medical science records, and to add another chapter to the pathos of this earthly existence. There are many enemies of slumber. Bad habits, cares of business, indiscretions in eating, and trouble as the sparks that fly upward, drive away refreshing sleep. Jacob complains of the troubles that gave him his sleepless nights.

In the day the drought consumed me, and the frost by night; and my sleep departed from mine eyes. (Gen. 31:40.)

Novelist-Mayor of Toledo

Brand Whitlock, the Mayor of Toledo, is having a singular administration in that city. He is an idealist and advocates a school of socialism. He pities the weak and the wayward, does not blame the bad, insists that the unequal social conditions are responsible for most of crimes, apologizes for the law-breaking element in the community, and insists that the enforcement of laws has little or nothing to do with the permanent advance in public morals. Recently a committee, representing the Federation of Churches in Toledo, called upon the mayor to urge upon him the necessity of enforcing the laws and to complain of his lack of vigor in the suppression of drinking, gambling and the social evil. His answer was an apology for the wrong-doers and a charge that human society, by its unequal distribution of wealth and privilege, made it impossible for people to be good. This idealist mayor is to be commended for his sympathy for the unfortunate, his kindness to the poor, and for his protest against some of the social inequalities of our time; but he is dead wrong in his diagnosis of the moral evils of the city and of the remedy necessary. His claim that the enforcement of the law has no tendency to improve morals is not well founded. Enforcement of just laws tends to respect for the highest authority, and elevates the standards of right living. Virtue soon grows to be rare in communities that are lawless. He is right in his statement that there is something deeper than the enforcement of law necessary to produce the best morals in a community, and that is the action of the individual heart; but he makes the great mistake of holding that fortunate surroundings only are necessary to make the individual heart good. The individual is good or bad according to his relation to God, to his relation to Christ on the Cross. It would have been so easy for the novelist-mayor to have suggested such a thing to a committee from the churches, but he did not do so. A philosophy or statesmanship which does not take into account the regeneration of the human heart by faith in Christ in the building up of the morals of the community, is not a safe guide. Where the individual heart is in harmony with Christ there will be springing up sentiments that will contribute to healthy public morals.

Whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things. (Phil. 4:8.)

A Street Scene in Oberammergau During the Passion Play

Mother Saves Son

Franklin Foote, aged six years, was fishing at the end of the long pier at Bell Island, near South Norwalk, Conn., recently, when he lost his balance and fell overboard. Miss Anna Lockwood, a neighboring cottager, attempted to rescue the boy with a fishing pole. He grasped it, but the light end of the pole slipped through his fingers, and he went down. Miss Lockwood's cry of alarm called to the scene Mrs. George F. Foote, the mother of the child, who was at the other end of the pier. Mrs. Foote, a prominent society woman of South Norwalk, who was dressed in a fashionable suit, leaped instantly into the water. She did not come to the surface for quite a while, and it was thought that both she and the son had perished; but presently she came to the top with the boy in her arms. She had accomplished the difficult feat of swimming under water, hunting for her child until she had found him. Coming to the surface she took a long breath, rested the child so that its head was out of water, and swam the full length of the pier, bringing her precious treasure ashore. There are numberless instances of heroism in the humbler walks of life, including the newsboys and little urchins that dive off the wharfs in the summertime, but there are also acts of heroism in high life, such as those of young Brokaw, who lost his life on the Atlantic Coast in his attempt to rescue a servant girl from drowning and of Mrs. Foote in saving her boy. The rescue fittingly expresses the undying love of the mother for her child; and also symbolizes the great mission to which God has called Christian motherhood, that of saving the children from the waves of wickedness and spiritual death. This mission of Christian motherhood has much to do with the salvation of both Church and State. Paul makes reference to this wonderful Christian influence of the mother over the child in his letter to Timothy in these words:

When I call to remembrance the unfeigned faith that is in thee, which dwelt first in thy grandmother Lois and thy mother Eunice; and I am persuaded that in thee also. (II. Tim. 1:5.)

German Emperor Preaches Sermon

On Sunday, June 26, the Kaiser conducted religious services aboard the imperial yacht Hohenzollern. He selected as his subject "Did Jesus Live?" which has recently been the topic of public discussion following the appearance of a pamphlet by Professor Arthur Drews of Karlsruhe, in which the professor declared that Jesus never lived. There were present at the service the Imperial Chancellor Dr. von Bethmann-Hollweg and other high officials. The Emperor preached a clear, earnest sermon, insisting upon the historicity of Christ's life and work, and upon his resurrection from the dead. These straightforward, wholesome, orthodox views, expressed by this great ruler, are an honor to his Church and to universal Christendom, and appear in healthful contrast to the fatal doubt which is taught in so many institutions in Europe and America. The question the Kaiser asked and answered is the all-important one of the race, which Christ answers for himself and for us.

Because I live ye shall live also. (John 14:19.)

THE HOME QUEEN'S REALM

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

EVERYTHING which concerns home happiness, household economy and the upbringing of children rightfully belongs to this part of our family page. You need not fear that you will make a mistake if you write with the utmost plainness about your experience in doing the day's work, about your burdens, your joys, your cares and your anxieties. Women understand one another, and as you write of your home life, shall I say, in Colorado, somebody else in Rhode Island or Tennessee will be ready to send back a helpful answer. In writing to Women in Council address me directly, in the care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. I wish to know you personally, to enrol you in my list of friends and to have you feel that you are as well acquainted with me as if you could sit with me on the veranda in the afternoon, drinking a cup of tea.

My Husband's People

"I have been married some years and love my husband devotedly, and he loves me except when under the influence of his home people. They are jealous of me and the children. They criticise us to him on all occasions. They seem unhappy when he shows us love or even politeness. My husband's salary is small and he is not able to remember my birthday or our wedding anniversary with a gift. I do not remind him of my birthday, but on our anniversary I make a cake and have flowers and we and the children are happy. Every year before her wedding anniversary his mother and sister make elaborate plans for a handsome present, such as a piece of furniture or a set of china, and my husband is expected to contribute liberal sums of money. Often the children need things and our house and I have to economize very strictly to make up for it. They always remind him of their birthdays in some way, and he feels guilty if he does not give them money. Our children have never had a birthday present from their father. It is hard for me to speak of money to him, and they would all three be angry if I objected to these gifts. Do you think I ought to say anything? V. H."

Wife and children ought to come first with husband and father. If he can afford to make presents to his mother and sisters, let him do so. Not, however, at the sacrifice of giving pleasure in his own home. It sometimes seems almost impossible for a mother to remember that her son owes his wife precisely the same loyalty that his father has owed her. You would be within your rights should you gently remonstrate on this subject. Of course, you wish to do and say nothing that might cause alienation on the part of your husband or his kinsfolk.

Is This Right?

"We are people of very moderate means, but have always done our share in the church where my husband is an elder. The church has been deeply in debt and we have been taxed as a congregation to pay the interest on the mortgage and settle up floating debts. An effort is now being made to build a parish house. I, for one, have felt that we ought not to undertake this enterprise until our mortgage is paid off, but the majority think otherwise. At a meeting last week my husband rose and pledged himself to give two hundred dollars for this purpose. I caught my daughter's hand and squeezed it, and she looked into my eyes with distress. It is she and I who will really pay this money, for we shall have to give up every possible indulgence, go without clothing we need, skimp and save everywhere. Is this right? ANNIE S. R."

I have my own ideas on the subject. When large gifts are contributed to a church, a library, or any other outside object the whole family should be taken into confidence and express their opinions before a dollar is given. What do you think?

Do You Give Your Child an Allowance?

"I am afraid I belong in the group of anxious mothers. I am constantly afraid that I will make a mistake and either omit something that I ought to do or do something that I ought not, in my management of my children. I give each child an allowance, beginning on the day when he or she first attends school. The smallest allowance is six cents a week; the largest twenty-five cents a week. If the children do anything wilfully wrong, if they do not put away their clothing and toys in the proper places, and if they are late in coming down to breakfast, they are subject to fines, losing a penny or two or three for each misdemeanor. I hope to inculcate habits of thrift and economy and also of generosity in my children by putting the responsibility of their small incomes on themselves.
"RACHEL L."

This subject should enlist the interest of every mother who reads this page.

Prince Henry and the Princess Juliana

THE little Dutch Princess, daughter and only child of Queen Wilhemina of Holland and Prince Henry her husband, is the object of idolatrous affection in her native land. Queen Wilhemina from her own childhood commanded the devotion of her subjects, who have regarded her with almost adoring loyalty. Before the birth of the little princess it is not too much to say that every home in Holland had its solicitude about the joy that was coming to the royal pair, and to the nation as well. Every day since little Juliana was born, she has grown in health and beauty. Here you see her sitting, just like any other child, on her father's knee.

The Children's Bedtime

MOTHERS should take pains to let the chi dren go happily to bed. To punish a chil just before bedtime is a great mistake. faults have been committed the mother may tal with the little ones, tell them their error and sho them that she is grieved, and if they have the hab of talking over the day with her, they will of the own accord confess any trifling delinquency and as forgiveness. The bedtime hour should be one i which mother and children draw very close togethe To withhold a good-night kiss because a child h done wrong is an unpardonable cruelty. To tell child that if he is naughty God will not love him also inexcusable. It is not true that little childre or those of an older growth lose God's love in co sequence of sin. "God loves the world of sinne lost and ruined by the fall." A parent does n cease to love a child because of the child's wilfu ness or disobedience. In the bedtime hour the should be prayers at the mother's knee and none a better than "Our Father who art in heaven" an the old and dear

Now I lay me down to sleep,
I pray the Lord my soul to keep;
If I should die before I wake,
I pray the Lord my soul to take.

The corresponding morning prayer is:

Now I wake and see the light,
'Tis God who kept me through the night.
To Him I lift my voice and pray
That He will keep me through the day.

Both these prayers are fitly co cluded with "For Jesus' sake. Amen."

The sweetest and tenderest be time hymn for children, one that ever child should know by heart, is

Jesus, tender Shepherd, hear me;
Bless thy little lamb to-night;
Through the darkness be thou near me;
Keep me safe till morning light.

All this day thy hand has led me,
And I thank thee for thy care;
Thou hast warmed me, clothed and fed me;
Listen to my evening prayer!

Let my sins be all forgiven;
Bless the friends I love so well;
Take us all at last to heaven,
Happy there with thee to dwell.

Individual Communion Cups

"It seems to me tha the underlying prin ciple with regard t the observance of the Lord's Supper i the 'setting apart of the common t the sacred use.' Things which woul be repugnant in the dining-room or i the home are not to be ignored becaus of the sacred associations. Man churches, and the number is co stantly increasing, have adopted th use of the unfermented grape juice t represent the 'fruit of the vine' use by our Saviour, instead of wine. W do not offer from the Lord's tabl what we would not place before ou guests. In the same way it is de manded that we do not offer the ele ments in a manner which would b repugnant in every-day life. I onc saw what convinced me of the neces sity of the individual cup. The cu was being passed to a row of people i front of me. A man and woman sa beside each other. As the cup left hi lips there was a drop of saliva clingin to the edge and its color showed to bacco. This with the swallow fro the cup passed into the mouth of th woman, who was a stranger to the mar This little incident left no doubt in m mind, and I have since used my influ ence in favor of the adoption of th individual cup as well as the unfer mented juice.
"(REV.) JOEL F. WHITNEY."

This opinion coming from a ministe of the Gospel ought to carry weight and is commended to the thoughtfu consideration of the Christian house hold and the Church.

ıake a friend. Would men whom he ad ground in hard bargains lift a and to save him?

Mental and physical suffering short-ned his heart action. The air became ppressive. What was keeping Chriss?

"O Hannah," he moaned, "if you ould look into my heart now; if you ould know the tortures of mind and ody which I suffer, you would forgive ıe."

A low rumble! Was it Chriss re-urning with help?

He listened tensely.

It was not the rattle of a buggy, but rumble. A wagon, heavily loaded, as backing up to the side door hardly dozen yards from the well.

"It's Simpkinses movin' in," he cried.

Waiting until all was quiet, Biddle elled, calmly at first, and then, after epeated failures, frantically.

"God help me to make him hear!" e prayed. Then tried again and gain until exhausted.

Would God help him? What right ad he to expect mercy?

"Heaven," he pleaded, "strike my ody dead and God save my soul."

The horses whinnied—there was the attle of buggy wheels—not one but everal—and the sound of voices in eneral excitement.

"Thank heaven," hysterically cried iddle. "Chriss has come back!"

Everybody was talking at once. But o one was raising a shovel to dig him ut.

Gradually the talk quieted down.

"What's to be done?" asked one. Biddle's dead by this time."

"I wonder if his wife has been sent or?" asked another.

"Don't imagine so. Of course she'll ake it hard at first. But it won't take er long to find a second husband who ill treat her better than Biddle did."

His Hannah marry another! The ought was madness.

Trying to pull his ear away so that is voice might pass through the vent iddle loudly called "Help, help!"

"S'pose they ain't no use to try to et him out without a derrick?" asked third voice.

"Naw," answered the man talking to he doctor. "I sent Biddle's Dutchman ver to Bear Wallow for Hampton and is well-digging outfit. Can't do nothin' ill it comes."

"Well, so long as he's dead they in't no hurry."

Bear Wallow! Hampton's! thought iddle. Nine miles there and back. If Hampton should happen to be at home would take two horses longer to haul derrick back than he could expect to ve. If some one would only fetch Hannah. The sound of her voice—erhaps in words of forgiveness—ould ease his death.

Slowly, but steadily, the stones set-led, pressing harder into his flesh. ometimes his brain seemed to turn ver. The pain, the fright, was driv-ng him mad.

Hannah would never know how he ad repented. But she would forgive im. A sob shook his frame. She had aid "good riddance." Perhaps she ould be glad.

A shout from above.

Biddle strained his ears to under-tand.

Hampton—on his way from a well-igging job—was passing. He was riving into the yard. All this Biddle lowly gathered in fragments.

Again his hopes rose high.

He could hear the men setting up he derrick. Scarcely six feet of earth nd stones to be removed from above is head. His life might be saved. If hey would only hurry.

What was that? Yes, Hannah had een sent for. That was glorious news. Ie resolved to keep quite calm and ave his strength.

Then he realized that he was stand-ing in water half way to his knees. Remembering that there had only been four feet of water in the well he listened to the men working above and waited.

Steadily the water crept to his waist.

What was that the doctor said? Hannah was coming—of course she was still young and good looking. But what of himself! Was he the kind of a man for a good-looking woman!

The water was rising faster. Had the vein been enlarged by the caving in—suppose it should come higher than four feet!

Fool! Now that the dirt around him had absorbed all that it could the water must naturally rise faster. God alone knew how high it might come. And the air—it was stupefying.

Such were Biddle's thoughts as he listened for the arrival of his wife. Was it all a dream? Had he really left their home that morning threatening never to go back?

At last Hannah came, moaning.

Then she was sorry. He swore to make amends if he ever got out. But the water was creeping up to his shoulders. Was he going to drown after all? No. He must live!

"Help!" he cried, scarcely louder than a whisper. He must be getting very weak.

If in some way he might let the men above know that he was standing; that it was such a little way for them to dig. The race was between water and men; neither was hurrying.

Would the poisonous air cheat them?

The water creeping around his neck aroused him from the deadly stupor.

"Oh, God! I shall never get out. Oh, for one little second in which to beg Hannah's forgiveness!"

With all his might he screamed out his repentance.

His head reeled. The effort had exhausted him. With the water stealing over his chin he fainted.

The next he knew the men were laying him on the grass. Hannah was on her knees beside him.

"'Lisha," she sobbed, "I didn't mean a word of it. If you had died, it would have killed me."

World Missionary Conference

address of Mr. John R. Mott (the presiding officer of the First Commission) on the subject of missionary unity. It was one of many notable addresses. In its report to the conference the First Commission gave some instructive figures. The millions still unreached by the Gospel are these: Asia, 42,000,000; Africa, 70,000,000; Arabia, 3,000,000; Syria, 550,000; the Sinaitic Peninsula, 50,000; Eastern Sumatra and adjacent islands, 3,250,000; Madura, Bali and Lombok Islands, 2,000,000; Malay Peninsula, 1,000,000. Total, 113,000,000.

In all, 788 Protestant missionary societies are at work in foreign fields. The annual combined contributions are $25,350,000. There are 5,522 ordained missionaries, 982 physicians, 2,503 men lay missionaries, 5,406 married women, 4,988 unmarried women, or a total of 19,280 foreign missionaries. There are 5,045 ordained natives, and 92,918 unordained teachers, preachers, Bible women, etc. The total living baptized Christians are 3,006,373; adherents 5,281,871. The native gifts aggregate $2,800,000.

In another article from a correspondent THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will deal with the further work of this great conference, which has laid before the world such a complete exposition of the missionary situation.

Crooked Spines Made Straight

If you are suffering from any form of spinal trouble you can be relieved in your own home without pain or discomfort. A wonderful anatomical appliance has been invented by a man who relieved himself of Spinal Curvature. Its results are marvelous. It is nature's own method. Eminent physicians are endorsing it. The Sheldon Method relieves the pressure of the affected parts of the spine, the whole spine is invigorated and strengthened, all soreness is taken out of the back, the cartilage between the vertebrae is made to expand, the contracted muscles are relaxed and the spine is straightened. There is bright hope for you, no matter how long you have suffered. We have strong testimonials from every State in the Union. Each appliance is made to order from individual measurements and fits perfectly. There is positively no inconvenience in wearing. We guarantee satisfaction and let you use it 30 days. Write for our new book, giving full information and references.

Coronation of Self-Sacrifice*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

WHERE?

THIS earthly coronation of Christ took place, not in some ponderous cathedral of "dim religious light," like the coronations of other sovereigns, but in a mountain temple, to proclaim, for one thing, in transfigured nature and human nature, that Christ is King of the natural world as well as of the spiritual realm. A reminder of this is timely at this season when so many are bidding good-by to the Ten Commandments as they start out for recreation on the mountainside and at the seaside. The transfiguration story bids us take Christ with us into God's out-of-doors if we would really have a "good time." Peter found it so. "A good time is one that does not go off with the having." If memories could all be washed away by a final bath in some river Lethe at the end of the summer, it might seem worth while to "take a day off" from the Decalogue; but it is not worth while in any season to take a pleasure which is pleasant but once—in the act—and will be bitter a thousand times in memory. Therefore take with you this test: "Nothing is true pleasure that is not pleasant to remember."

To one who has learned from the Bible how to worship, nature is seen to be the oldest and newest testament—every grand mountain, a psalm; every placid lake, a beatitude; every storm, an apocalypse. As an artist's child in his studio proudly and gratefully says, "All this is my father's work," so a Christian should feel, as he stands among the matchless scenes of nature, which artists struggle vainly to reproduce.

It is a part of the cant of the irreligious, who worship nowhere, to talk of a Sunday picnic as

Worshiping God in Nature

WHEN?

And this reminds us that it was probably on the Sabbath that this quiet walk was taken into the hills with Christ and his most spiritual friends for high conversation.

"After six days." Dr. Joseph Parker exclaims in substance, "Does not everything best in our lives occur 'after six days'—in the uplift of the Sabbath?" A true Sabbath is indeed a mountain top of invigorating atmosphere where we get away from the endless talk of selfish profits, pleasures, honors, into a tonic zone of altruism. John, on a later occasion, saw the long ascended Christ in the opened heavens because, even in his island prison, he was "in the Spirit on the Lord's Day." Selfish and sinful Sunday pleasures bring no such joy as that. Isaiah is profoundly true to human experience when he says that to "make the Sabbath a delight" we must "turn away from pleasure," that is, from selfish pleasures as well as from selfish work.

That passage of Isaiah is the fullest statement of God's Sabbath law (58: 13, 14), and in it, as in a mirror, we see that Sunday golf is Sabbath breaking quite as much as Sunday shopping, and the Sunday excursion not one whit less distinctive of the great humanitarian Sunday rest principle than the Sunday factory. Doing nothing is not Sabbath-keeping, but doing good. So Jesus taught by example. This accords with Isaiah's picture of the Day, not alone as one of rest and worship, but most of all as a day for the development of unselfishness.

Commercialism has such a grip on Anglo-Saxon nations that they need, more than any others, the halt in selfish activities that God commands and which they would make on no lesser orders. It is not only permissible, but desirable, that worship should get out of the church into the open as much as possible in the summer. Some day we hope churches will have an outdoor auditorium for use whenever the weather permits. Why should consumptives only have sanitary structures?

WHO?

People Who Tire, and Others Who Rest Us

Now we come to "who?" in that perpetual question book by which every lesson can and should be made a conversation rather than a lecture: Where? When? Who? What? It is timely to remind ourselves that in planning our recreation trips and tours, it matters not half so much where we go as with whom we go. One who goes alone to the most famous resort or with uncongenial company will get little benefit either from air or food. It matters not so much what you eat as with whom you eat, especially if you are choosing table company for a whole voyage or a whole season. In our lesson story, the company was the very best that ever climbed a mountain together. With "the Man of men" for leader, went the inner cabinet of his most spiritual

TURN OVER TIME
When Nature Hints About the Food

When there's no relish to any food and all that one eats doesn't seems to do any good, that is the time to make a turn over in the diet, for that's Nature's way of dropping a hint that the food isn't the kind required.

For a number of years I followed railroad work, much of it being office work of a trying nature. Meal times were our busiest and eating too much and too quickly of food such as is commonly served in hotels and restaurants; these, together with the sedentary habits, were not long in giving me dyspepsia and stomach trouble which reduced my weight from 205 to 160 pounds.

There was little relish in any food and none of it seemed to do me any good. It seemed the more I ate the poorer I got and was always hungry before another meal, no matter how much I had eaten.

Then I commenced a fair trial of Grape-Nuts food, and was surprised how a small saucer of it would carry me along, strong and well satisfied appetite, until the next meal, with no sensations of hunger, weakness or distress, as before.

I have been following this diet now for several months and my improvement has been so great all the others in my family have taken up the use of Grape-Nuts with complete satisfaction and much improvement in health and brain power.

"The American people undoubtedly eat hurriedly, have lots of worry, thus hindering digestion, and therefore need a food that is predigested and concentrated in nourishment."

Sunday School Lesson

apostles. It was not favoritism in Christ, but spiritual receptivity in Peter, James and John that made them the best of company. "Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled." They were by no means faultless. Indeed, Christ rebuked Peter more frequently and more severely than any other apostle; and John and James were also rebuked for calling fire from heaven on a city that failed to welcome their Master, and indirectly for their ambition, expressed through their mother, for the best places in the earthly kingdom they thought Christ would establish.

Many men do little wrong because they do little of anything. It is the full cup that is most likely to spill. It is worth while to give much attention to getting the noblest companionship possible for your leisure hours in whatever season. Jesus said: "Come unto me . . . and I will rest you" (literal reading). It is the personalities rather than the places of our leisure hours that determine whether they shall recreate or dissipate our physical, mental and spiritual forces. This question of what company we shall have for leisure hours involves also the choice of books, through which we all have opportunity for fellowship with the great and good.

The events of this lesson are excelled in importance in the whole history of the world only by the birth and death and resurrection of Christ; and all of those events are best viewed from the Transfiguration Mount from which we look out on heaven and earth, life and death, Old Testament and New, the Kingship and Saviourship of Christ.

WHAT?

Behold that little company of four climbing the mountain for a prayer-meeting; and remember, when only two or three faithful ones gather with Christ for a prayer meeting on a hot evening of summer or a stormy night at some other season, how wonderfully in their case the promise was fulfilled to the "two or three" that gather in Christ's name. How much better than talking bitterly and uselessly against God's hot weather, when every blazing day is worth a million dollars to the corn crop, to forget personal discomfort in a vision of Christ at the prayer meeting, just when our presence will be the greatest help!

Then note, for encouragement, that while Christ prayed—doubtless for strength to bear the cross he saw near at hand—even these most spiritual apostles, unable to understand these deep things, fell asleep. (The Sabbath then began at evening.)

Preachers and teachers often speak as if it was only to those of great faith that Christ gave blessings. But all along the story of his life we see how kindly he helped those of "little faith." Faith like a broken reed, he did not break; faith like a smoking lamp, he did not quench, but, as in this case, fanned it to a flame.

How Prayer Beautifies and Strengthens the Body

"As he prayed, the fashion of his countenance was altered." His body also and his very clothes were changed by his prayer. Every week in the Sunday papers whole pages are devoted to essays on how to make faces more beautiful. Many a woman stays away from church to read and practise these directions, who would get more abiding beauty by going to hear some preacher who would give her a vision of life's larger meaning. No one with small and mean and selfish thoughts can really be beautiful after the skin-deep beauty of youth has passed. "Of the mind the body form doth take." Moses, Jesus, Stephen, all got angel faces by looking in the face of God. Not all professing Christians are beautiful. Sometimes the fault lies back in their parents, sometimes in their own earlier days of sin. And some of them are only half converted and so are "uglier than they have any business to be." But a life of trustful prayer will at least make any face more agreeable to look upon. And the body also will be affected by a life of obedience to God's spiritual and natural laws, in which the spirit "keeps the body under, the soul on top," as a boy put it. I saw eight people asleep while the great Henry Ward Beecher was preaching, and preaching, too, on the relations of body and soul. He exclaimed to that after-dinner audience: "You put an array of difficulties over against yourselves by your appetites that are more than a match for your prayers. You overeat your prayers." And then, for the people that give too little attention to the body, he said: "Some of you are too heavy for the animal you ride." Christians have given far too little thought to fitting soul to body, like noble melody to lofty words. Transfigured flesh! Let not those forget how Christ "glorified God in his body," who still hold the old, mediæval idea that the body is the seat of sin. A pure soul will transfigure the flesh and make it strong and pure. But prayer affected Christ's clothes as well. Let not the women of to-day forget, when devotion is almost banished from many churches by hats that not only hide the pulpit from those behind them, but proclaim and produce a state of mind wholly foreign to worship.

The shining garments, body and face of Christ, with the transfigured cloud above and snow-capped mount below, proclaimed the unveiling of the divine glory Christ "had with the Father before the world was," which was uncovered just this once in his earthly life that he and his most spiritual disciples might walk by that supernal light through the dark hours of the cross and passion that were just ahead.

Encouragement From Abroad

THE far-reaching effect which CHRISTIAN HERALD advertising has upon its readers is well illustrated by an instance which occurred the other day. One of our subscribers who lives in India read an advertisement in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD concerning some merchandise which she felt would be especially suited to the needs of one of her friends in New York. She wrote to New York advising her friend to buy THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, read the advertisement in question and send for the goods. The New York friend did so and was so pleased with her bargain that she immediately subscribed for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD on her own account and bids fair to become a steadfast member of the Great CHRISTIAN HERALD Family.

As a matter of fact THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has as great a reputation in foreign countries as it has in the United States. This reputation is in part due to the relief work carried on by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, but the paper is much appreciated in those countries where its subscribers depend upon it for a résumé of news of the world as well as for light upon those more spiritual matters which are the prime motive of the publication. We frequently receive inquiries concerning advertisers from these foreign members of the Family.

Whenever any of our subscribers is defrauded by an advertiser in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD we will make good the claim, provided that the subscriber, who must be of record, has mentioned THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in writing to the advertiser, and provided the claim is made to us within two months of the date of the appearance of the advertisement.

A PLEASURE, NOT A TASK
To Make Ice Cream with the Alaska Freezer

The "Alaska" requires less ice, less time, less labor than any freezer made. A few reasons follow:—

The high can of the "Alaska" exposes more surface to the action of the ice and salt, and gives less diameter of mixture to freeze through. Assembled in 15 seconds. You can have delicious ice cream in less time required by freezers with short thick cans.

Again, the "Alaska" has a double motion. The can revolves in one direction, the dasher in another.

The dasher of the "Alaska" is the most reliable, scientifically constructed device of its kind. The dasher floats are shaped like slotted mixing spoons, and they beat the cream as if by hand, making it smooth, mellow, delicious.

The "Alaska" makes superb ice cream in from two to four minutes.

If your dealer cannot sell you the "Alaska" we will send you two-quart size prepaid anywhere in U. S. on receipt of $2.00; but ask your dealer. Send for booklet, "Alaska Frozen Desserts."

The Christian's Rewards*

THE dream of heaven, founded upon the enchanting descriptions of Holy Writ, has been the solace and joy of God's people ever since Christ brought life and immortality to light.

Even far back, before any clear revelation had come to men of the majesty of Jehovah and the glory of his dwelling, seers and poets caught glimpses of the divine beauty of the future abode of the righteous, and voiced their visions in thrilling prophecy and verse.

The sweet singer of Israel had no such abiding and perfect faith in the future after death as was vouchsafed to the great apostles. To him, only a little more than to the other Jewish leaders, did immortality shine forth. By many of the ancient Jews, it was utterly disbelieved.

It was true that David seemed to have a revelation when he cried in ecstasy, "Thou wilt not suffer thy Holy One to see corruption," and "At thy right hand there are pleasures forevermore."

There was a glimpse again of the view beyond the dark curtain when he exclaimed, "I shall be satisfied when I awake in thy likeness"; "Your heart shall live forever"; and "God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave."

It is Christ alone who opened to mankind the blessed aspirations to immortality, aspirations which have dignified and ennobled our human state as nothing else has ever done before or since. If David had had any definite conceptions of an immortal state, it is impossible that he should not have expressed them in his great poems. They would have been just what he needed, for the imaginations of the poet have ever been fired as by nothing else, with thoughts of immortality, and of the joys of the future state.

The most delightful of these rewards is that we shall know the Father, the one altogether lovely, the chief among ten thousand. To know him was, as Macaulay says in his great essay on the Puritans, the crown of joy to those devoted souls. They could think of nothing more satisfying to the righteous, and so it has been with the great army of the saints, martyrs and prophets, throughout all time.

"Oh that I knew where I might find him!" cried Job, as though that were the first pressing need of his suffering soul.

Many have sought for him in nature, wandering over the mysterious mountains, sailing the seas, penetrating into remote solitudes, but, as Charles Wagner says, nature at her best, even when she displays her utmost beauty and tenderness, is "but a fringe on the mantle of God."

Before the closed wall of the crystal skies, the old prophet cries: "Oh, if you would rend the heavens and descend among us!"—a new step in the search for God.

It was partly in order that this yearning of his chosen ones to behold him might be satisfied, that God became man and dwelt among us. Then dawned the glorious revelation that God was not "a quaffer of ambrosia, a reveler, seated in everlasting light, while man weeps and toils in the darkness; but a God working in our flesh, weeping our tears, joining in our struggles, full of pity for us, even lying beside us in the grave that he might lessen the gloom."

It is the sight and the everlasting intimate friendship with this Being of infinite powers and goodness, which will form the most beautiful heavenly reward of those who love him.

Living with Christ*

THE very word "Christian" should mean that one lives with Christ. You are not his child, if you do not feel yourself to be as close to him as to those of your own household.

"If you wish to hear an answer to your questioning," says George Matheson, "you must come inside the house" with Jesus. It is there only, close to him, in daily communion with him, that we may get "the calm mind, the placid conscience, the rested heart, the bending will, the quiet patience, the tranquil faith, the underlying peace, the optimistic love," which he is ready to bestow, but which can not be imparted suddenly, in an instant, or by means of irregular, spasmodic communion. It can come only through daily association of the mind and heart with Jesus.

We betray at once, to the intelligent eye, the sort of people with whom we have lived. If we are boorish and unrefined, it is inferred by those who see us that we have kept company with the boorish and unrefined.

Sometimes this is unjust. There are those who are innately so vulgar that neither the best companionship nor any amount of training can elevate them. All the pearls in the world would fail to attract the admiration or cultivate the taste of swine, though constantly cast before them.

Still, all should remember, especially the young, that the fathers and mothers, the brothers and sisters, all those with whom we have lived, are discredited by us, when we do evil. "Birds of a feather flock together," is so generally true a proverb that it is universally accepted. Let us beware then how we conduct ourselves outside our homes, lest we dishonor those whom we love.

Several instances are on record, and doubtless many more have occurred, of conversions which have been caused simply by a godly example presented to a whole household. In one very striking case, no word was spoken, no direct religious instruction was ever given by a certain good woman, who boarded with several others in an irreligious family; yet so unselfish and loving was her disposition, and so faithful was she to all the observances of her religion, that the skepticism and indifference of the others melted before her sweet fidelity, and they, too, became followers of the Lamb.

The trouble with us all is likely to be that we treat our Saviour as an occasional guest—a great and honored one, it may be, but not as the intimate and deeply beloved Elder Brother of our family—a part of our very lives, whose estate and reputation are bound up with our own, and whom we are expected by every one to resemble.

It is true that the realization of such nearness is hard. Imagination on the part of the mind, and consecration on the part of the spirit, must be exerted to the utmost.

"The relation to God," says President King, "has a universality all its own. To come into any worthy personal relation to a God, right relation to whom involves right relation to all others and to all else, is no holiday task. It calls for a girding up of the loins of our minds. It is not, to use the words of à Kempis, the work of one day, nor children's sport."

Only by this constant, daily association with the divine can we fulfil the noble injunction of Robert Browning:

So duly, daily needs provision be
For keeping the soul's prowess possible,
Building new barriers as the old decay,
Saving us from evasion of life's proof,
Putting the question ever, "Does God love,
And will ye hold that truth against the world?"

Read the Word daily, pray without ceasing. So and so only may we live with God, realize his love, and "hold his truth against the world."

We Propose This to You, Mrs. Housewife

Let us bake the beans for a month of hot weather, then decide for yourself about going back to home baking.

We have an army of excellent cooks here, and they have the best of facilities. Millions of folks consider their beans the best that were ever baked.

Let them soak the beans, boil them and bake them, and send them to you ready to serve. They'll be just as fresh—just as savory—as though they came direct from the oven.

You can keep a dozen meals on the pantry shelf, ready to serve in a minute. Think what that means in August.

These cooks of ours use only Michigan beans. And they pick out by hand just the whitest and plumpest—the finest beans grown.

They bake in steam ovens, heated to 245 degrees. They bake in small parcels so the full heat goes through. Home-baked beans were never half so digestible.

Yet the skins are not broken, the beans are not crisped. The beans come out nut-like, mealy and whole, because we don't use dry heat.

And the tomato sauce is baked into the beans, giving a delicious zest.

Telephone your grocer for a month's supply. These are the days of all days to have meals ready-cooked.

When summer is over, let your folks decide about going back to the old kind. They will never vote to change.

The National Dish Van Camp's BAKED WITH TOMATO SAUCE PORK AND BEANS The National Dish

Don't get the wrong brand, for there are no other beans like Van Camp's. We pay for our dry beans four times what some beans cost. We make our tomato sauce from whole, vine-ripened tomatoes. It costs five times what some sauce sells for. That makes a world of difference.

This premier food, which is 84 per cent. nutriment, should be served in the best way known. It is a very cheap food—an ideal food. Let your folks have the kind they prefer.

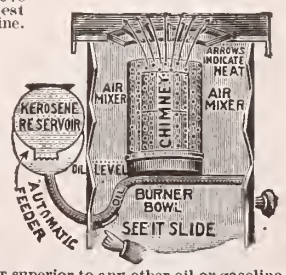
Requires no more attention. No wick—not even a valve. Nothing to leak, clog or close up.



ENTHUSIASTIC PRAISE. D. CARN, Ind., writes: "Costs only 4½ cents a day for fuel." L. NORRIS, Vt.: "Saves at least 50 to 75 per cent. over wood and coal." E. ARNOLD, Neb.: "Range cost me $5.50 per month for fuel. Harrison $1.25 a month; saves $4.25 per month." L. I. RICH, N. C.: "Grandest stove for summer I ever saw." E. L. COOPER, Tenn.: "Gives satisfaction in every respect. Certainly honsewife's friend during hot weather." J. C. CAMPBELL, Nebr.: "Far superior to any other oil or gasoline stove. Perfectly safe, economical, cleanly. Fine baker and great comfort to us." THOS. VINCENT, Wis.: "Wife never had anything she enjoyed so much. It is very quick—no heated room or dirt. Surpasses anything we ever saw." MRS. F. E. FITE, O.: "Best, cleanest and most perfect stove we ever used." A. HOECK, Fla.: "Can't speak too highly in praise of them." E. TUBBS, N. Y.: "Bought one of your stoves three years ago. It is a perfect wonder. Would not part with it for ten times its cost." J. LUFT, Kans.: "The longer I use it the better I like it."

NOT LIKE THOSE SOLD IN STORES.

Ideal for roasting, baking, cooking, ironing, canning fruit, picnics, cottages, camping. No hot, fiery kitchens. Absolutely safe—can't explode. Not dangerous like gasoline. Simple, durable—lasts for years. Housekeeper's friend. Saves time, labor, money. All sizes. Price low—$3.25 and up. Prepare for the heated term. Write to-day. Send no money—just your name and address. We will send you full description—hundreds of testimonials. Best summer stove on earth.

WHIRLWIND SUCCESS FOR AGENTS.

HEAD & FRAZIER, Tex., write: "Enclose $81.00; rush. Sell like hot cakes. Sold 50 in our town." B. R. HUSTED, Mich.: "Out one day, sold 11." L. RUDDIMAN, Mich.: "Congratulate you on your success; sold 4 one day." HY. SEARLE, Ark.: "Sold 8 in 1½ hours." MRS. NETTIE JENSEN: "Sold 7 after five o'clock." So they go. Livest agent's proposition out. This patent new—nothing else like it. Not sold in stores. Demand enormous. Agents reaping harvest of dollars. Every family needs and wants one. Show 12—sell 10. Write to-day for 1910 agent's special plan. Get in early.

Home Music Crowns Home Life

NOTHING adds more to the refining influences and the full enjoyment of the home circle than the inspiriting power of music. Grave or gay, it is a source of comfort for the older members, and gives an outlet for the overflowing spirits of youth. The children join with abandon in the rollicking chorus and are wholesomely impressed by selections of a more sober nature.

The Columbia Graphophone is the perfect musical instrument for the home. The whole range of musical accomplishment is at its command--the vocal or instrumental solo, the orchestral or band selection,—reproduced and rendered without a trace of mechanical effort.

The home life is incomplete without a Columbia Graphophone. As a means of educating your children and inculcating a sense of the beauties of music, it is incomparable. By hearing an accomplished artist again and again, your daughter can best obtain that style and expression which no amount of teaching can give; your boy can realize to the full the capacity of the instrument he plays and obtain those little finishing touches which mean so much. We all know of the trouble with some children to get them to pay any attention to their music. The Columbia Graphophone is the one instrument that awakes in them that desire to learn, without which teaching is a discouraging task. The realization of the ideal home life, for every member of the family, is through the Columbia Graphophone.

Now is the time to get the full enjoyment from your instrument. Out on the porch in the cool of the summer evening, forget the heat and trials of the day. We present below a suggestion of two outfits of machines and records for your consideration. Our nearest dealer has a complete stock of machines and records, and will gladly show you them and play selections for you. We can give you his name if you ask.

DISC OR CYLINDER TYPE
Prices, $20 to $200

The "B N" Complete Outfit
(DISC)

The first high-grade disc machine ever offered at its price. A faithful reproducing instrument of faultless workmanship and finish right through. Furnished with your choice of six Double-Disc Records (twelve full selections) and two hundred needles, and on the easy monthly payment plan, if you prefer.

Price, at Any Columbia Dealer's,

The "B K T" Complete Outfit
(CYLINDER)

One of the most popular cylinder Graphophones. Compact, shapely and simple, it is an entirely new departure in talking machine design. No rubber tube, no horn crane, no horn-stand, no clumsy attachments, nothing to get out of order.

Plays both Two-Minute and Four-Minute Records, and the horn swings in any desired direction. With your selection of six Columbia Indestructible Records,

$37.10

An outfit that will give you inexhaustible pleasure for years to come. Easy terms, anywhere.

COLUMBIA
RECORDS ON COLUMBIA GRAPHOPHONES

In Columbia Records the Graphophone user has a wealth of musical talent at his command. Instrumental solos, duets, trios, by every popular instrument; band and orchestral selections played by the famous combinations of either group; vocal solos, ranging from the popular "hits," the standard songs and ballads, to the selections from Grand Opera by the greatest artists in the world.

The Columbia Company first introduced Double-Disc Records---the most popular innovation among users of disc machines. The Columbia Indestructible Record is our latest achievement for the improvement of cylinder machines and has absolutely done away with the fragile wax record. Catalogs at any Columbia dealer's or by mail.

Those Old Familiar Hymns

THERE'S no sort of music that seems to lend itself to reproduction on Columbia Records like such grand old hymns as "Nearer, My God, to Thee," sung in the Columbia laboratory by well-known choristers from certain famous New York City churches. And that's a thing that you may never have realized.

Think of your own favorite hymn, sung as you may have heard it on some one special occasion—solo, duet or quartet—and then hear it pouring from the reproducer of the Columbia Graphophone. It will be the living voice—flawless, full, rich and beautifully clear in tone and enunciation.

It is impossible to realize the effect produced by Columbia Records of sacred music without actually hearing them played. There is no exaggeration in saying that the one difference between hearing "Abide with Me" rendered by the Grace Church Choir of New York City and hearing it on the Columbia Graphophone is merely a difference of surroundings.

Some eighty-seven of the hymns and sacred selections that have found a permanent place in the affections of the people are included in the Catalogue of Columbia Disc and Cylinder Records

Records by Gipsy Smith

WE are fortunate in having the exclusive right to reproduce the songs of Gipsy Smith, the famous evangelist. Gipsy Smith's voice is marvelously sympathetic, and it happens, also, to be a wonderful recording voice. The reproduction is unmistakably faithful to the original and very few records ever made can compare with these for distinctness.

Although it is well-nigh impossible to convey in words an adequate impression of those qualities which render the singing of Gipsy Smith so unique and so supremely attractive, it should be said that overshadowing all others of these qualities, is felt the expression of a loving human sympathy as wide as the universe itself. In the vivid accents of a faith that is complete and perfect, and a sincerity, the fervor of which carries an unmistakable message to the heart of every listener, is found the true spirit of the evangelist shining through his recorded work.

If you own a talking machine mail us $1, and we will send you prepaid No. A 5146—"He Lifted Me," and "Jesus, the Light of the World," and a complete record catalogue with it.

CHRISTIAN HERALD

AMONG THE MORNING-GLORIES

EXPRESSIONS of FAITH

JUNE 29, 1910.
Your paper is full of the very essence of high-class thought, and must be wielding a tremendous influence with the masses to ennoble life and bring out latent qualities to tell for the honor of our King. Bringing out as you are the grandest thought of the most earnest men of the day, must have weight in moulding other lives to follow the highest and truest.
McKinney, Tex. H. A. L. GREENWOOD.

APRIL 13, 1910.
I am so thankful I had the privilege of Dr. Klopsch's acquaintance through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD so many years. The world is the better for his having lived the few years. I hope your paper will continue to live in more families. A paper moulds the minds of its readers. Your paper's influence is good. I am so thankful you can go on with the paper as it was.
Joy, Ill. MRS. MARTHA N. LUTZ.

APRIL 22, 1910.
I feel very much honored to be one of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family. We get more consolation from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD than from all the rest of our subscriptions combined.
Speers Ferry, Va. A. J. WOLFE.

APRIL 22, 1910.
I have been a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for years and I know of no paper that can fill its place. May THE HERALD continue under its present editor to build up humanity to the cause of Christ, and to care for the needy is my prayer. L. W. BROWN.
Havana, Kas.

APRIL 15, 1910.
May the good work of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD be carried on as formerly, with God's blessing overruling. MRS. G. A. LANE.
Sherwood, Calif.

APRIL 20, 1910.
I have been a subscriber for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for many years and think there is no paper equal to it. We wish it all success and prosperity. MRS. H. FRANKLIN.
Bradford, Pa.

APRIL 20, 1910.
We hope for continued prosperity for the paper, since the death of the greatly beloved and widely lamented Dr. Klopsch. May wisdom and help of God be given to the one who shall take his place in management of the interests of the paper, etc. MRS. C. T. TUXFORD.
Escanaba, Mich.

APRIL 12, 1910.
I have been very much affected by the death (as we called it) of Dr. Klopsch, but we know that he is not dead, but among the living in an upper sphere, employed again in the work of the Master. I never saw him, but I love him. We will follow by and by, and be with God and with Christ Jesus. May the Lord continue to bless THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.
N. Yakima, Wash. REV. F. J. JACROUX.

MARCH 30, 1910.
When I saw the account of Dr. Klopsch's death, I felt like my dearly loved paper was almost ruined, but upon reflection I was sure some one else would be raised up to take his place and go on with his good work.
Westfield, Ind. MRS. GEORGE KITTINGER.

APRIL 11, 1910.
I am glad you will take an interest in the paper and its subscribers, for you could not have been left anything better than THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. MRS. W. H. PEASE.
Monson, Mass.

APRIL 12, 1910.
It is with regret that we learn of the home-going of the chief editor of the paper, but I understand the paper is to continue as before.
Findlay, O. MRS. ANNA S. BOYER.

APRIL 25, 1910.
We are grieved to give up our faithful leader, but I hope to remain in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family the remainder of my days.
Troy, Mo. MRS. C. J. LEOFLER.

APRIL 9, 1910.
We pray our kind heavenly Father to bless you in the heavy task of editing this wonderful paper. ANGELINE PEARSON.
Fairmount, Ind.

APRIL 6, 1910.
Dr. Klopsch was a man of most wonderful ability and consecration. Words cannot express our great loss. May the Lord bless and still carry on the good work of our mutual friend and leader, and greater power rest on the one who takes his place.
Gainesville, Fla. MR. AND MRS. J. E. BATES.

APRIL 13, 1910.
I am glad to see the work goes on though the workman dies, and the Master lives and reigns. C. M. W. FOSTER.
Johnstown, Pa.

AUGUST 5, 1910.
While all of us greatly mourn the loss of Dr. Klopsch, I am glad to note that you are keeping the paper up to its highest standard.
St. Augustine, Fla. REV. J. H. MARTIN.

JULY 27, 1910.
My mother said the Bible and CHRISTIAN HERALD had been her greatest comforts in all her life, and I feel the same.
Fort Benton, Mont. MRS. G. H. STEVENS.

APRIL 22, 1910.
I appreciate your inestimable paper so highly that I hope to be able to have its weekly visits while I live. It has been a constant source of inspiration and helpfulness to me ever since I first took it. May THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have a long life of usefulness.
Concord, Pa. M. JENNIE DONNELLY.

JULY 29, 1910.
You may put my name on the life-long list as I anticipate its weekly arrival with great pleasure, and never want my home to be without it. MRS. FRED S. SPENCER.
Rockford, Ill.

I was so surprised to learn of the death of dear Dr. Klopsch. He seemed to be so entirely in touch with both the spiritual and physical needs of the human race that his loss will be greatly felt, but the Lord has seen fit to call him home to rest from his labors. He is able to supply his place, and so we will trust that the work will continue and make continual progress. M. M. MCKISSACK.
Plainfield, N. J.

APRIL 8, 1910.
I appreciate your paper, which is always on the right side of things. W. H. SWIFT.
Honesdale, Pa.

MARCH 24, 1910.
May God grant that the good work of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD may continue, even though our dear friend and brother has gone to receive his reward. Dr. Klopsch's monument is already erected; it is not one of marble, but the fruits of the work done among nations in the time of catastrophe. His works follow him.
Mt. Hermon, Mass. WM. P. HANG.

As for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, we cannot do without it. MRS. G. R. TURNER.
South Bend, Ind.

APRIL 2, 1910.
Hope THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will continue to enlarge and grow in its wonderful work.
Nashville, Tenn. HARRY MYERS.

APRIL 12, 1910.
Long live THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is my wish, which has furnished so much comfort and pleasure. MRS. R. A. GREEN.
Bastrop, Tex.

APRIL 21, 1910.
I thought when dear Dr. Talmage was taken the paper then would fail, but Dr. Klopsch carried it on so that we never knew the difference, and I trust the paper will still be the same under your management, as it has been said God's servants pass away, but his work still goes on. May the dear Lord bless and sustain you in the labor of love. MRS. SOPHRONIA CAMP.
Rockport, Ill.

APRIL 8, 1910.
With the loss of our dear friend and editor, Dr. Klopsch, my first thought was what will we do without THE CHRISTIAN HERALD? Am so glad that it will still come as a weekly visitor to our home. May God bless you abundantly in your work. MRS. C. S. GRAHAM.
Lansing, Mich.

APRIL 9, 1910.
I was sorry to read of the death of Dr. Klopsch. Hope all branches of his work will be kept up. Seldom does a good man die but the Lord raises up some one to continue his work. H. B. DEWEY.
Clayton, N. Y.

APRIL 4, 1910.
I have been a subscriber for the paper for over fifteen years and trust it will still be a weekly visitor to my home in the future. Although our dear editor has left us, his work and influence still live.
Sterling, Neb. MRS. HELEN M. BROWN.

MARCH 15, 1910.
THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is one of the most powerful and influential papers in our Christian civilization. Many, very many days have gone by since I was a regular subscriber. I have kept many copies that they may help me as a member of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family.
Hurlock, Md. JNO. C. MEDFORD.

MARCH 18, 1910.
THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has done a noble work among the world's people. It is my hope and belief that THE HERALD will go on in the same spirit of truth. MRS. CAROLINE DRAKE.
Avon, Ill.

APRIL 28, 1910.
Have been a patron of THE HERALD for many years and prize it highly.
Thermalito, Calif. MRS. E. B. COOPER.

APRIL 25, 1910.
We hear with great sorrow of the death of Dr. Klopsch, but God will surely provide that the great work of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD may go on with ever increasing usefulness.
Peking, China. MRS. MARY B. CALHOUN.

APRIL 21, 1910.
Please accept our heartfelt sympathy in your loss of Dr. Klopsch. Praying his successors may follow his example and continue his great work and wishing you and the other members of the staff all prosperity.
Quebec, Can. MRS. WM. ANDERSON.

APRIL 18, 1910.
Wishing our paper may be brighter each year and grow in usefulness as it has done heretofore. MRS. C. H. WINDERS.
Satsop, Wash.

MARCH 10, 1910.
May the same God who has taken the beloved Dr. Louis Klopsch, the leader in so many good works, raise up Joshuas to fill his place and to go forward to accomplish great things for the world in the service of the Lord Jesus. And may each member of the large family of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers help those who lead, if only by offering much prayer for their success. MARGARET W. LEWIS.
Brooklyn, N. Y.

APRIL 4, 1910.
I have been a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for many years. We appreciate it. May God bless and prosper it is the wish of Delphi, Ind. ANDREW GOETZ.

APRIL 11, 1910.
THE HERALD has been a welcome visitor to me for many years, and I hope it will continue to be a great help in the future.
Callasaja, N. C. J. J. WATKINS.

MARCH 16, 1910.
I have been a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for a good many years, and I always said that I would rather have THE HERALD come into my home once a week than all the daily papers in the United States; because I could find all the important news without reading or scanning columns of reading that could only be degrading and demoralizing.
Oberlin, Kan. MRS. J. S. FORSDICK.

MARCH 14, 1910.
I have been a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for many years, having commenced when Dr. T. DeWitt Talmage was its editor, and rejoice in its great growth and its powers for goodness in the world.
Hudson, N. Y. PETER R. FINGAR.

MARCH 22, 1910.
I reared my four children on THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. They are grown now and good women and men. My sympathies go out to all on the staff of the beloved CHRISTIAN HERALD.
Lynchburg, Va. MRS. E. T. KREBBS.

MARCH 21, 1910.
I am sorry to hear of the death of Mr. Klopsch, but suppose it will make no difference with the publication of the paper.
Rochester, Minn. F. A. POOLE.

MARCH 23, 1910.
I hope THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will continue to be the interesting magazine it has been.
Los Angeles, Calif. MRS. N. ORR.

Allow me to state in reference to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that I think it is the best paper published. It is very valuable to me. I live on a ranch, twenty-five miles from a town. What a pleasure and a comfort the grand sermons in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are to me. When one reads these eloquent sermons and meditates over them they feel as though they had attended church. Best wishes and success to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD staff. MRS. J. C. HOLLEBEKE.
Carmel, Tex.

APRIL 6, 1910.
Was very sorry to read of the death of Dr. Klopsch. Hope his mantle may have fallen upon some of his associates and that the good work may go on. MRS. JOHN JEMISON.
Middlebourne, W. Va.

APRIL 8, 1910.
Allow me to express my profound regret and sympathy because of the death of the man who has done so much for the paper and humanity and hope for the future of this paper that he has done so much good in the past.
Port Orford, Ore. REV. CHAS. W. HIGGINS.

MARCH 16, 1910.
The ways of Providence are past finding out, but when God's servants are cut off from the earth heaven opens to such as he. The work man may fall, but the work must still go on. The life of God surely controlled Dr. Klopsch. With sincere wishes for the continued success and good work of your invaluable paper THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. JAMES PIERCE.
Drakesboro, Ky.

EVER since Dr. Klopsch passed away we have been receiving large numbers of letters of encouragement and of confidence in the future of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

We never had any doubt of the allegiance of the whole Christian Herald Family, but it is gratifying to receive so many assurances of good faith.

Extracts from a limited number of letters are published on this page.

MARCH 16, 1910.
May your excellent paper, under new leadership, continue to exert its wholesome influence, until our blessed Lord, whose right it is to reign, shall come again and overthrow all the powers of darkness. GERRIT HUYSER.
Detroit, Mich.

APRIL 18, 1910.
I have been a subscriber for fourteen years and I love the pure, clean reading, and earnestly hope that it may continue the same. Wishing THE HERALD success,
Cuba, N. Y. MRS. M. G. CAPEN.

THE HERALD is a great help and comfort to us. MRS. JOHN J. VAN DEN BERGH.
Santa Barbara, Calif.

APRIL 22, 1910.
We are very much pleased with your paper. I was formerly a reader of the Home Herald, but I find THE CHRISTIAN HERALD more interesting. It is a very helpful paper for any one to read. A. LAROCHE.
Bound Brook, N. J.

APRIL 22, 1910.
For your encouragement, let me say, I was taken into your family by adoption from the Home Herald, and am delighted with the new order; never have noticed an objectionable feature in your paper; read it with pleasure and reverence. OLIN HILL.
Providence, R. I.

MARCH 22, 1910.
Am very sorry to learn of the death of your editor. Hope your arrangements are such that you will continue publishing right along, for we enjoy the paper very much.
Minneapolis, Minn. A. R. MILLER & SON.

APRIL 14, 1910.
I am exceedingly sorrowful and in deep sympathy with you at the loss of our Dr. Louis Klopsch. I feel, though, the work will go on and Dr. Klopsch is more alive to-day than ever before. MRS. ELLA POWERS.
Colorado Springs, Col.

APRIL 22, 1910.
I hope that the paper will come forward regularly, as I do not wish to miss a number, and wish God's blessing upon your publication and work in general. J. P. RICHARDSON, JR.
St. Louis, Mo.

MARCH 14, 1910.
Now, though our honored leader, Louis Klopsch, has gone, I am sure the work so nobly begun will still find noble hearts and ready hands to carry it on. MRS. A. W. NORTON.
Grass Lake, Mich.

APRIL 14, 1910.
No words can express how Dr. Klopsch will be missed. But let the good work that he loved so well go on. I want to send my little share in as soon as possible. I wish I could do more. MRS. THEODORE D. DIMON.
New York City, N. Y.

APRIL 11, 1910.
I am sure that our heavenly Father will see fit to let some one else take the place of Dr. Klopsch to carry on the noble work.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

A WEEKLY ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE FOR THE HOME

A Korean Country Church Built by the Members

The City Gate of Seoul, the Capital

The Quaint Native Chair

A MIDNIGHT JOURNEY IN KOREA

By MISS ELLASUE WAGNER

Author of "Kim So Bang," "Pokjemie" and Others

SONGDO, the ancient capital of Korea, is a city of about one hundred and twenty thousand people, and lies fifty miles north of Seoul. As missionary my work was in this great heathen ity, and a few months after my arrival there occurred one of the most interesting as well as terrifying experiences in my life in that country.

It was during the Japanese-Russian war. The gentle, peace-loving Koreans saw their land trodden by the hosts of the Japanese army; marauding bands of rough soldiers were laying waste the villages and plundering the defenseless people. From across the Yellow Sea came news of the American boycott and bitter anti-foreign feeling in China. Disquiet and hostility were in the air, and not even the wisest dared prophesy the outcome.

It became necessary for me to go to Seoul. Our missionaries were few, they were overburdened, and I must go alone, for no one could be spared from the work to go with me. There was no railroad, and a trip of fifty miles overland by narrow mountain paths was a tiresome journey of two days. The means of travel in Korea are varied, but not very choice. There are no horses and the tiny little ponies are so vicious and unruly that women seldom dare to ride them. The natives are splendid pedestrians and think nothing of walking several hundred miles. There remained, therefore, but one way, namely, to be carried. The Korean closed chair is only a little different from the sedan chair in structure; this is used by all high-class native ladies who venture beyond their own courtyards.

We started a little after midnight, Wednesday morning. Four chair-coolies, all strangers, and Ke Pai, a Christian boy whom I knew, comprised my escort. Since I knew little of the language, my friends thought it best for us not to stop overnight at any of the inns along the way, for they were all squalid and small as well as sometimes unsafe. By starting at midnight and traveling the rest of the night and the next day, we could make the fifty miles by twelve the next night, if all went well.

Daybreak Wednesday found us far from Songdo. Soon the rain came down in heavy sheets and the narrow pathway became muddy and slippery, while the tired, struggling men pressed onward, every little while losing their footing. It was a long, weary day, and by late afternoon the heavy rains had made rushing torrents of the mountain streams. The primitive temporary bridges of brush-wood had been swept away. The zigzag stream had been crossed many times on our way and with each crossing it grew deeper and more turbulent; at the last fording it was above the waists of the men, and they lifted the chair on their shoulders to keep it clear of the water, as they fought their way across the flood. I sat with closed eyes, fearing to see the yellow waters swallow us up. Without warning, the man in front stumbled and lurched forward, breaking the shaft. The creaking chair slipped and dipped sideways into the river. Just how they managed to get me to shore I do not know; for although in no real danger, I was considerably shaken up and unnerved.

Korea's New Masters—the Soldiers of Japan

Night soon closed in, the blackest, darkest night I think I ever saw. The rain had ceased, but the heavy mist hung like a blanket over the earth. The little paper lanterns with their tiny candles gave but faint light and were extinguished every little while by the strong puffs of wind. I had not thought of being afraid before leaving home, but as we slowly wound our way along the narrow paths in the darkness I found myself trembling with excitement. Wet to the skin, cold and uncomfortable in the broken chair, it was small wonder that under the conditions I found it difficult to control my fears. All the unpleasant stories ever heard of the robbers who infest these mountains, thoughts of the uprising in China, and of the Korean we bung (insurgents) all came to mind, as I peered into the blackness ahead.

The mountain, north of Seoul, is crossed by Peking Pass. About midnight we came to the foot of this mountain and began the ascent. The mountain is quite bare, and standing at the bottom, in daylight, one can easily see the top and the clear-cut pass to the summit. We had overtaken the relay of chair-coolies in the afternoon, but the journey had been long and trying on all, and the men, completely exhausted, swayed and reeled from one side of the path to the other under their heavy burden, while their quick, sharp breathing was painful to hear. I insisted that they should rest, and gladly they threw themselves down on the wet grass by the wayside. Grateful for an opportunity to rest my cramped limbs, I scrambled from the chair, then stood transfixed with fear and terror. Coming over the crest of the mountain were hundreds of torches and lanterns. Faintly from far away came strange wild voices, shouting and screaming. Louder, louder swelled the weird, fantastic noise, and drums, bells and gongs could be heard.

LOOKING TO THE CROSS

An Unpublished Discourse by DWIGHT L. MOODY, America's Greatest Evangelist

This is the fifth of twenty remarkable sermons by Moody, never before published, and the existence of which was disclosed only a few months ago. The absolute authenticity of the sermons is vouched for by the evangelist's son, Wm. R. Moody, who cordially approves their publication in this paper. The sermons are the exclusive property of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. One will appear each month.

WHAT grand singing we would have on this earth, if everybody believed that "God is love." This morning I was speaking on that subject. I was trying to show that for 6,000 years God has been trying to show the world that he loves it.

Some one has picked me up about my theology. Astonishing how many people like to straighten me out in my theology! The most frequent mistake I encounter is the impression that God loves only those who love him; that he loves the good people, but not the sinner. That is the devil's lie; drive that back to where it comes from. God loves the sinner. God hates the sin, but loves the sinner. If you have a child that has got the smallpox, you hate smallpox, but you love the child, don't you? You see the distinction. Now, God hates sin worse than you ever hated smallpox; but God loves the sinner more than you ever loved the child—any one of you. If I cannot prove that from the Bible, I can't prove anything. Jesus Christ did not die for good people. He died for the lost; he died for sinners. He died for the whole world—good, bad, indifferent, all together. That is the teaching of Scripture.

Dwight L. Moody

Now, a good deal of this false theology we get from our mothers. You get it from your mother. You very often hear the mother teach the child that God loves it when it is good, and hates it when it is had. Very bad theology.

The Wrong Kind of Teaching

I was in a train some time ago, and a child got restless. The probability was the child didn't take proper food. It cried and the mother said: "If you don't stop, I shall give you to the first policeman when we get out of the car." The mother lied. She wouldn't give it to the policeman. That didn't scare the child, and then she said she would throw it out of the window. That was another lie. She wouldn't do it. If any one had taken the child and thrown it out of the window, there would have been a row there pretty quick, wouldn't there?

Now, when you teach the child that God loves it when it is good and hates it when it is bad, what is the child going to do when it grows up? If it is as bad as most of us have been, we would think it belonged to the devil. Suppose you have a neighbor cursing and swearing, and you teach the boy that when it is good it belongs to you, and when it is bad it belongs to that neighbor, it wouldn't know to whom it was born. Now, there has never been a day since the child was born that you didn't love it. Did you notice that God never told Adam that he loved him until he put him out of Eden? When Adam fell, God came down and showed his love. That is the teaching of Scripture. Ah, but you say, what is the thought of the passage: "God is angry with sinners every day"? One of the strongest proofs that God loves the sinner.

I have two sons. One goes out and swears, and it makes me angry to have him take such a course. I think this throws light on that. I would doubt my existence as quick as I would doubt the fact that God loves me. That is one rock that I have been able to stand on all these years. I used to think that God was after me with a double-whetted sword, and thought he was my enemy; but when I found God was a God of love, it changed my whole life and my relations toward God, and it will change yours very quickly. Thousands and tens of thousands would be converted in the next twenty-four hours, if they believed that text.

God's Love for the Whole World

Now, I don't know anything that brings out that love of God better than the Cross. When Paris was in the hands of the Communists, they took some of the leading citizens and nuns and shot them. Among others there was the Archbishop of Paris. There was a low window in the shape of a cross in the door of the cell. He didn't know his turn was coming, and he wrote at the top of the cross: "Life," "Death," "Love," "Lengths" and "Breadths." He had got to learn the wonderful story of God's love. It reached to the foundations and the borders of a lost world. That cross is just God showing his love to the world. Abraham offering up Isaac at Mount Moriah was a sort of background to bring out vividly the great God offering up his Son.

You remember one night, while Abraham lay there in his tent asleep, God came to him and told him to take his only son off to a distant mountain, which he would show him, and there offer him up as a sacrifice. Abraham had been in covenant with God long enough to know that God makes no mistakes, although he could not understand. If you had looked into the patriarch's tent the next morning, you would have seen the servants all busy around the tent, getting the food ready for their master, for he was going off on a long journey. I have pictured him at nine o'clock—the old man, with long beard, white-haired, and the son just coming into manhood, and the servants—the four men starting off on the journey. And I can picture that old man turning his head away to weep, and to wipe away the tears. He didn't want Isaac to see that terrible struggle going on. Night came on, and Isaac fell asleep, tired and weary with the hot day's journey. And I can imagine the father not sleeping that night. It must have been the time of the full moon. And you can see the father going and looking into that sweet, innocent face; none so fair and beautiful to that father as that boy's face. And I can imagine him saying: "Isaac, how can I give thee up? Why does God make such a demand upon me?" He didn't sleep much that night; and if he did, his slumbers were disturbed by dreams. Next morning he eats little at breakfast. Isaac thought perhaps he was going to fast, because he was going off to the mountain. The next day a terrible struggle goes on in Abraham's breast. Many a time his eye falls on that son, and he says: "How can I part with you, my boy? You are dearer to me than my eye." The second night a terrible struggle. He doesn't sleep much that night. Many a prayer goes up to God for help and strength. The next day comes. He says: "This is the last day I am to have my boy with me." And he clung to that boy. How very dear he was to him!

Abraham and Isaac on Mt. Moriah

The last night has come. That night he didn't sleep at all; he couldn't sleep. Many a tear he shed during that night, and many a cry went up to God for help. The next morning he takes no breakfast; there's a terrible struggle going on. Isaac has never seen his father in such trouble before. He doesn't understand. That morning they journey a little ways. Yonder is Mount Moriah. I can imagine Abraham's heart thump, thump against his side. It beats very quickly. He says to the men: "You sit here. I will go with Isaac yonder to worship." On the way up the mountain, the boy says: "Father, here is the wood and here is the fire and the knife, but where is the victim—the offering of the lamb?" I have thought how pathetic that answer was: "God will provide himself a sacrifice." And a few hundred years later, he provided another sacrifice. You tell me it wasn't provided? I can see the evidence.

They have got to that mountain peak, and they are rolling up the stones and are building an altar. They have it all. Everything is ready for the victim. There is the fire to be applied. There is the knife. Everything ready but the victim. I can see Isaac looking all around to see where that lamb is to come from. I can just imagine the old, white-haired patriarch, saying: "Sit down here. I want to talk with you a little." I can see the father sitting down on the mountain. Perhaps no father in the world loved his boy as Abraham loved Isaac. And then, perhaps, he told him his history: how he was called out of the land of the Chaldeans and how he had been called into this land; and how the message came to him from heaven, telling him God would make his seed like the stars of heaven, and that through him all the nations of the earth should be blessed, and through his seed should come kings and rulers of the earth, and how great and mighty his name should be in the earth; and perhaps he told him how, one day, as he was under the oak on the plains of Mamre, two messengers came from heaven to bring him the good news that he was to have a son, and what a day it was to him, and with what joy the promise thrilled his heart. And he says: "The day he came into my home was the happies day of my life. I can't tell you what joy it gav me; how it thrilled my soul, and what a comfort yo have been to me ever since you were born. An do you know, the last night I was at home, God cam to me and told me to bring you here and offer yo up as a sacrifice? Now, my son, I don't understan what it means; but I want to tell you it would h much harder for me to offer you than to be offere up myself. I would rather have you bind me an put me on this altar and slay me, than to put yo there. But I must obey God. It would break m heart to have you refuse to let me bind you and pu you upon this altar. And now let us get down an pray for strength."

Our Sins Covered by the Cross

I see the father and son praying. The old ma weeps. His feelings overcome him. And I ca imagine Isaac praying that he may have strengt for that hour. And he binds him hand and foot an lays him upon that altar, and he bends over him t give him the last kiss. Everything is ready now fo the knife. He raises that hand, and suddenly the falls from heaven the voice: "Abraham, Abrahan spare thy son!" And hundreds of years after, whe Jew and Gentile took Christ and nailed him to tha cross, I haven't any doubt that the apostles thoug that voices would come from heaven again, and Go would say: "This is the Son of my bosom; this my only Son. Spare him." But God didn't brea the silence. And the apostle says: "God freely gav him up for us all." Tell me that God didn't lov this world when he gave the Son! As a matter o fact, he gave him freely. We are told that Abra ham saw Christ's day, and was glad. God lifted th curtain of time and let him look, and he saw God son going to Calvary with his cross, bearing awa the sins and the sicknesses of the world.

And so I would like to take you to-day to th cross and look into that face, and look at those hanc pierced for you, and those pierced feet. Have yo seen that Roman soldier coming up and driving h spear into the side of the Son of God, and the bloc and water coming out and covering the spear! think the most infernal act of all was the drivin of that spear to the very heart of Jesus. That wa the darkest deed. Thank God, it will atone for ever sin. There is no sin so black but that it may b covered by the Cross.

Will you go to Calvary and doubt for a momen that God loves this world? Doubt your existence a quick as that.

I have very little sympathy with people who sa it didn't cost God much (because he knew he wou come to resurrection again) to have his Son spa upon, held up between heaven and earth, exposed t shame and derision, mocked and called a blaspheme Would you make light of such love and sneer an jeer at it?

A Mother's Love and Sacrifice

There is a little girl there in one of the rear seat Let me tell her a story; and if I can make her un derstand, probably the rest will. When the Cal fornia fever broke out in this country away back i '48, there was a man here in New England who ha a dear little boy. But the man got the fever so ba that he wanted to go to California and leave his wi and child. The wife begged hard not to be lef she wanted to go with him, but he was poor an unable to take her. He thought he would soon b rich, and he could bring her to California. He wen out with high hopes, but met with one disappoin ment after another. Months and years passed b fore the long-looked-for letter came, bringing the the money to bring them to California. But at la he succeeded and brought them out to San Fran cisco. It was a time of delight and joy when letter came to that town in New England, bringin good tidings to this mother that she and her so were to be restored to the loving one. They wen to go to New York, and thence to San Francisc and he was to come down from the mountains t meet them. They had been out at sea a few day and a good many passengers were on deck. It wa a cloudless day and everything was lovely, whe suddenly, there was heard a cry: "Fire! Fire! The pumps were set to work. Buckets were throw over the side and pulled up full. They did ever thing they could, but the fire gained. The mag zine was full of powder, and the captain knew tha all would perish. He ordered the lifeboat lowere There wasn't room enough to take all on boar The mother and the boy were left on deck. The la boat was pushing away. The sailors said: "W daren't take one more." Afghan Idea of Justice

OME grim stories are told of Afghan justice. On account of ie scarcity of timber the Ameer or- ered that "three trees should be lanted where one was felled." One ay a poor man was brought to trial or breaking a branch off a govern- ent tree. When asked why he had one this, he said he had had no wood ith which to bake his bread. This xplanation did not satisfy the justice, e condemned the man to be hanged y his hands to the tree which he had utilated. The following day he was be hanged by his feet—turn about or five days—and then brought back the Ameer. Fortunately, he did not ve to receive his full punishment. nother instance of the same kind was iat of a baker who, having sold short eight, was baked in his own oven. moolah (priest) showed his disap- roval of the Ameer's prospective ourney to India by predicting that he ould never return. The priest was ummoned to the royal presence and sked whether he had made such a re- ark. Knowing that there had been everal witnesses present at the time, e answered in the affirmative. He as commanded to repeat his remark. s he did so, the Ameer cried, "Do not ay another word!" He instructed a ailor, who had been sent for, to sew p the lips of the moolah, saying: "His outh shall not be opened, should I eturn safely; but should I fail to re- urn, open his mouth and proclaim him true prophet throughout Afghan- tan."

SOMEBODY CARES

SOMEBODY knows when your heart aches,
And everything seems to go wrong;
Somebody knows when the shadows
Need chasing away with a song.
Somebody knows when you're lonely,
Tired, discouraged and blue;
Somebody wants you to know Him.
And know that He dearly loves you.

Somebody cares when you're tempted,
And the world grows dizzy and dim:
Somebody cares when you're weakest,
And farthest away from Him.
Somebody grieves when you've fallen,
Though you are not lost from His sight;
Somebody waits for your coming,
Taking the gloom from your night.

Somebody loves you when weary;
Somebody loves you when strong;
Always is waiting to help you,
Watches you, one of the throng
Needing His friendship so holy,
Needing His wateh-care so true;
His name? We call His name Jesus.
His people? Just I and just you.

The Children's Pulpit

THE PASSWORD

By Rev. J. M. Farrar, D.D. *

YOUR first name was "I." When you came into this world you looked up as though you wanted to say, "I am here!" That was the password and it opened the door of your mother's heart. The little long word "cry" was for several months your best password. It was like a night key and opened the door of mother's sleep. A small boy in Boston went to his father's library and found "I" was the password. He was in a great hurry and when he found the great door was locked began to shout, "Let me in!" His father said, "For whom am I to open the door?" The boy answered, "It is me, Harry." The father answered, "You are not my Harry; he would say, 'It is I.'" Not until Harry said, "It is I," would his father open the door. When Harry went to college he joined a fraternity and received another password. After he graduated and went into business he was again given a password. This password was "Honesty." It opened many great doors for him. All through life he found the value of a password.

GIRLS need a password. A wise mother gives her daughter the word "Modesty." Another good password is "On time." "Pure heart" opens many great doors. It is a splendid password. Will each Junior select a password for this week and then see how many doors it will open?

Here are six letters: T. H. I. R. S. C. Put your brain to work and make with these letters a good password for boys and girls. Revelation 2: 17 tells you something about the secret word of a good Christian. This word will open all of the great doors on earth. It will open the door of your tomb and the gates of heaven.

Are you really in earnest? Do you really think you can put the letters together better if I tell you a password story? Then I must tell you the story:

ONE bitter winter's night a little Irish lad stood in the streets of Dublin, homeless and friendless. Wicked men were making him their tool, and he was even then waiting to help in a crime. In the darkness a hand was laid on his shoulder. The face he could not see, but a kind voice said, "Boy, what are you doing here? The hour is late; go home, and go to bed." He could only answer, shivering, "I have no home, and no bed." The kind voice asked, "Where is your father?"

"My father went to America, and my mother is dead."

"Poor fellow! Would you go to a home if I sent you?"

"Indeed I would."

"Well, then go to such a street and number, ring at the gate and give them the pass."

"The pass? What's that, sir?"

"The word that will let you in. Remember the pass is John 3: 16. Don't forget, or you can't get in. John 3: 16."

THE boy ran to the place. Timidly he rang the bell at the iron gates. A gruff porter opened. "Who's there?"

"It is Jack Devonshire." Then all was quiet, there was no answer and the iron gate did not open. Jack started away thinking some one had been making fun of him. A voice that seemed to come from nowhere and was softer than a whisper said: "Your password, John 3: 16." Again he rang the bell and said: "Please sir, I'm John Three Sixteen." In a moment the great gate was wide open.

"All right," said the porter, "you've got the pass."

PRESENTLY he found himself in a warm bed, the best he had ever known. Before going to sleep, he thought, "That's a lucky name. I'll stick to it." In the morning he had a warm breakfast before being sent out on the street. Though he did not know it, God was leading him. Through suffering and sorrow he was to realize the blessed meaning of his password. Crossing a crowded street he was run over, picked up unconscious, and taken to the hospital. Soon fever and delirium set in. In ringing tones he said over and over "John 3: 16. It was to do me good, and so it has! My name is John 3: 16; please open the gate."

THE words were heard all over the ward. Testaments were pulled out to find what he meant. So it came about that one and another read the words. And as they read it, they could hear the sick boy crying, "It was to do me good, and so it has!" The Holy Spirit used the words and souls were saved then and there. After a while the lad's senses returned. A voice from the next bed said. "Well, John 3: 16, how are you to-day?"

"How do you know my name?"

"Know it? You've never ceased telling us. Blessed John 3: 16! It's from the Bible," the voice went on; "blessed Bible!"

"Bible? What's that?"

THE poor little waif drank in the answer. The verse was read to him, and he said, "That's beautiful; it's all about love, and not a home for a night, but a home for always!" Jack Devonshire was a name given to him in the orphan asylum, and he threw it away with his old ragged clothes. With a new suit of clean warm clothes he took his new name and always kept it. It was John Three Sixteen. Friends gave him an education, and he grew up to a career of great usefulness. He found the great word in T. H. I. R. S. C.

Grant's Poor Marks

MAJOR-GENERAL FREDERICK D. GRANT, the eldest son of President and General U. S. Grant, was not long ago a guest at a dinner given by certain college and school teachers. The chairman rose to introduce him. He had hunted up an old story about the Grant family, and was much pleased with himself that he had something so interesting to say.

"When Fred Grant was a boy at West Point," he began, "his father, the famous general, wrote to the commandant inquiring how the son was progressing.

"'You need not worry,' the commandant wrote back. 'Your son is getting better marks in everything than ever you had in anything.'"

The gentleman was not quite so self-satisfied when General Grant rose to respond.

"That is a perfectly true story," he said smilingly. "I remember the incident perfectly, but there is a mistake of one generation. I, and not my famous father, am the general who wrote to the commandant; and my son is the one whose father had such poor marks. But never mind, Mr. Chairman; it's all in the family."

The Jump of a Deer

A TRUE story has just come to this office from a gentleman who happened to be looking from the window of a train as a frightened deer dashed off the track.

The train was passing along a winding valley in Western Massachusetts. High hills rose from it on either side.

The deer scaled the hill just above the train. A high, barbed wire fence was built, a rod or more from the track and parallel with it.

The man who was watching the deer thought, "He will have to stop when he gets to that fence. He never in the world can make an up-hill leap which will clear it. I hope he won't try it. If he does, he is sure to get caught on the barbs."

But he did not know the powers of a deer.

The gentle, beautiful creature lightly approached the fence, and without making any perceptible effort, vaulted entirely over it.

It seemed an almost incredible feat to the lookers on, and it was certainly a beautiful sight.

Nearly Arrested

WHEN Roosevelt returned from his first inauguration, two bright, nice-looking children were waiting for him just inside the White House grounds. Each carried a camera and aimed it squarely at the new president as soon as he came in sight.

He raised his hat to them, but said in a stern voice, "I'm going to have the officers put you out of here."

Several of the guards who accompanied him were men from out of town. They were tired and nervous after the hard day's work and started forward at once upon hearing the president's words.

One of them seized the little girl roughly and another seized the boy, but before they could be hustled away, the president conquered his laughter enough to say, "Never mind. You needn't arrest them. They are my own children."

Ethel and Archie Roosevelt were merely having a little fun with their father.

How Mont-Lawn Celebrated

JUDGE TOMPKINS ADDRESSING THE GREAT GATHERING AT MONT-LAWN ON INDEPENDENCE DAY

ON the morning of Independence Day our 336 little guests at Mont-Lawn were up bright and early. Never had the Children's Home looked more beautiful. "Old Glory," in a snapping breeze, greeted the morning sun. After breakfast visitors began to arrive, and by noon the incoming trains brought many from the big city and from distant points in neighboring States. Their carriages and stages dotted the winding roadway, which stretched like a ribbon from the Nyack depot to Mont-Lawn.

At noon, Matron Hyde sounded the call for dinner for the children. They gathered from all points and, forming in military line, marched up the gravel path to "Fort Plenty," where a bountiful luncheon was spread in honor of the day. With splendid zest, they sang the familiar "Grace Before Meat," which has now been in use at Mont-Lawn sixteen years. Then, at Matron Hyde's signal, all were seated, and the feast began. When it was over, the children were marshaled on the lawn by Captain Constantine, the Home director of outdoor amusements. Forming a hollow square with the flag-pole in the centre, the children listened to the reading by Miss Stagnatt in a clear resonant voice of the Declaration of Independence. An outburst of cheering followed and the flag was enthusiastically saluted by children and visitors, the "Pickaninny Band" meanwhile playing the "Star-Spangled Banner."

There were as usual many guests who had come to the Home for the celebration. Some of these had been there before and were glad to come again on the Fourth. Others were there on their first visit, and one gentleman and his wife, who had come from Pennsylvania to see with their own eyes the "Children's Paradise" of which they had read so much, said to one of the people in charge "the half has not been told," and said that the Home should have their prayers and aid.

Mrs. Louis Klopsch came up from New York and spent the greater part of the day, greatly to the pleasure of all those who loved Mont-Lawn and its founder. Mrs. Klopsch is always present on gala days with a few distinguished guests, and comes up frequently at other times to show her interest and to aid with kind suggestions the work of the Home and its helpers. During the day she held an almost continuous reception and at the service of song in the chapel had a place of honor on the platform.

Rev. Stephen Merritt, the Home chaplain, and his wife were busy responding to the greetings of their many friends. Others present were Mr. and Mrs. Henry Emery. Mr. Emery is the architect who had done much to make Mont-Lawn beautiful. Mr. G. H. Crawford, of Brooklyn; Mr. and Mrs. Don O. Shelton, Rev. Lyman Wheaton, D.D., of Ridgefield, N. J.; Mr. and Mrs. Braider, of Plainfield, N. J.; Mr. and Mrs. H. B. Kleinhaus, of Easton, Pa., and many others. One elderly lady came from the northern part of New York State for her first visit to the Home. She is a woman who has to work hard for her daily bread, but she supports a cot for the entire season. None was more welcome than she and the warm reception she received at the Home she so dearly loved and for which she had worked so hard touched her deeply.

At two o'clock, all proceeded to the Children's Temple, where the concert was to be given. Under the leadership of Professor Noll, the children sang a number of their favorite hymns and patriotic songs, to the delight of the audience. Several famous singers had kindly volunteered their services for this concert. Mr. Marcus Kellermann, the celebrated baritone of the New York Symphony Society, sang two fine selections, his splendid voice of great depth and richness delighting all who heard it. His singing of Schumann's "Two Grenadiers" awoke a furor of applause. Mr. Karl Rieck, the well-known tenor, sang two beautiful selections, suited to the occasion, and Miss Fanny Blauvelt, contralto, gave a fine solo. The Steinway Company of New York gave the use of a magnificent concert grand piano for the occasion, greatly adding to the musical enjoyment.

Guests and children now proceeded to the lawn in front of the Homestead Building, where the patriotic exercises were to take place. Seats for the principal guests were arranged on the wide verandas of the Homestead, and on the sloping grassy platform immediately in front the speakers were gathered. Mr. G. H. Sandison, managing editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, presided, and introduced as the leading orator of the day Hon. Arthur S. Tompkins, Judge of the Supreme Court, who delivered a stirring and patriotic address on "The Day We Celebrate." The next speaker, Mr. Don O. Shelton, president of the National Bible Institute of New York, took as his topic "Our Young Folks," and gave some splendid practical advice to both children and adults. Cynthia Westover Alden president of the International Sunshine Society spoke on "Sunshiny Lives" and told her hearers how they might learn to radiate happiness everywhere. Kate Upson Clark, of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD editorial staff, and well known as an author and lecturer, gave some excellent advice to "Our Girls." Rev. Dr. C. H. Mead kept the children in roars of laughter and the big folks as well, by his inimitable stories. The one sad task of the day was assigned to Rev. Dr. Ferdinand C. Iglehart, who spoke on "Our Friends Who Have Passed Over." His address was an eloquent tribute to the memory of the late Dr. Louis Klopsch, the founder of Mont-Lawn and the "Children's Friend."

China's Ambassador at Mont-Lawn

Rear-Admiral Charles D. Sigsbee, who came down from the Catskills specially to visit Mont-Lawn, and who is a popular favorite there, made a brief address, which was greatly enjoyed.

Just as the oratorical programme was about to conclude, a slender man of distinguished mien, clad in a flowing robe of some silken stuff, and with a thoughtful scholarly face, stepped from an open carriage at the entrance gate of Mont-Lawn. He was accompanied by a younger man, dressed in a light summer suit of American make. The visitors were His Excellency Chang Yin Tang, Ambassador of China to the United States, and his son and secretary, Hon. Henry Chang. Minister Chang, who is living in a beautiful home in Upper Nyack for the summer, had come to see the little tenement guests of Mont-Lawn at their holiday exercises. Like his predecessor, Minister Wu Ting Fang, Ambassador Chang was familiar with the great work done in China by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers in relieving suffering during the great famine, and in supporting a large number of orphans who were left parentless and destitute after the famine ended. Minister Chang was introduced to the assemblage and through his secretary made a brief address. He spoke in terms of high commendation of the generous efforts of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers in China and other lands and paid a noble tribute to the memory of Dr. Klopsch. He expressed the hope that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD might go on successfully in its beneficent career of world-wide philanthropy and helpfulness, and that its readers might continue to enjoy the blessings that come to all who strive for the uplift of humanity.

Many of the leading guests were then presented to Minister Chang, who received all most graciously. After watching with deep interest the games and drill of the children on the wide-spreading lawn, he walked over to "Fort Plenty" and stood by, a greatly interested spectator, while the children filed in to take seats for supper. Minister and Secretary watched with wide-open eyes the long orderly procession file past and deploy into the different aisles, ach group taking seats at its proper table. Then he clear, young voices were raised in the simple ittle song of thanksgiving and all fell to eating with earty appetites. Before leaving Mont-Lawn, Minster Chang expressed his appreciation of his expeience there in unmeasured terms.

The evening passed quickly with games and music, he Pickanniny Band fairly eclipsing itself in its nstrumental efforts. "Twilight tea" was served o the guests where they sat on the porches and the awn. Then as the shadows fell and the long, perect summer day drew to a close, a brilliant display f fireworks made beautiful Mont-Lawn luminous or miles around. By eight o'clock the visitors had eparted, Matron Hyde had all her little boys and irls in bed in the dormitories, and half an hour ater all was quiet at the Children's Paradise. leep reigned over Mont-Lawn.

JUDGE TOMPKINS' patriotic address at the gathering on the lawn is given below:

"It is a great privilege that we of this community re afforded the pleasure, by the enterprise and atriotism of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home, of meeting in this beautiful place and amid hese inspiring scenes and surroundings celebrating he one hundred and thirty-fourth birthday of our Republic. But in the enjoyment of our manifold blessings, of the liberties that have come down to us, of privileges that have been accumulating and multiplying during all the history of our country, we are apt to lose sight of the sacrifices of the early settlers of the colonies, and the heroism of those who, in the early days, created and made possible the privileges and blessings and accomplished the peace that we now enjoy in such large measure. We are apt in time of peace and prosperity to forget the heroism exercised and the sacrifices that were made by those who cradled and defended our country through the days of its early struggles.

"And so it is good and wholesome that, at least once a year, on this Independence Day, this heroic day, we should meet, and with flags unfurled and patriotic music, and children singing the old songs of patriotism, glance backward over the years and contemplate the past and reflect upon the lives and achievements of the men and women whose names and deeds illuminate the pages of our country's history, and whose patriotic lives and works have culminated in all the pleasures and privileges and achievements of the day in which we live.

"What was done on the fourth of July, one hundred and thirty-four years ago? [Children: "The signing of the Declaration of Independence."] On this day, one hundred and thirty-four years ago, this Republic, this country of ours, had its birth. On that day what was destined to become and what has become the political light of the ages was established. The little American Republic had in it the prophecy of a great future, and so, from the little settlements along the Atlantic Coast, it extended to the Alleghany Mountains, and then on to the Ohio, and then on to the Mississippi River, and on to the Rocky Mountains with their snow-capped peaks, and still on over to the golden shore of the Pacific. But it didn't stop there; on it sped on its way to the Far East. From the few weak American colonies along the Atlantic Coast it has grown into a mighty nation of forty-eight great States, each an independent commonwealth and yet all bound together with the indissoluble bond of the Union.

"And on this day, hallowed by all the sacrifices of the past, with all the prosperity and happiness of the present and bright promises of the future, what is the spirit that should dominate our minds and hearts? What is the sentiment that these songs and memories and blessings should inspire? What is the spirit that this hour should impart? The spirit of gratitude. Gratitude, that begets future patriotism, is the spirit that should fill our minds and thrill our hearts as we meet on this one hundred and thirty-fourth birthday of our country. Gratitude to the brave and wise fathers of our Republic. Gratitude to the soldiers and sailors who have fought our greatest battles. Gratitude for all who fought on the battlefield. Gratitude for every bullet-riddled flag. Gratitude for every drop of blood given and for every deed of valor done, and for every act of human triumph as a result of which we are enjoying the liberties under the Star-Spangled Banner. Yes, gratitude should be the spirit of this Fourth of July celebration—here and everywhere; now and always!

"And how may we manifest that gratitude? We can do the past no service, but we can renew our devotion and loyalty to our country and its Constitution. We may best manifest our gratitude by obedience and respect for the law, which is the foundation, the cornerstone, upon which our Republic and its Constitution rest; by a hatred of lawlessness and disorder; by an unceasing warfare against anarchy that would destroy the government. Yes, by an unceasing warfare against every form of vice and iniquity.

"You boys probably never will be called upon to volunteer or enlist to fight your country's battles, as the soldiers of '61 and '65 were called upon to do, because I believe that the days of warfare, the days of the army and navy, and soldiers and bloodshed are over; that the dawn of eternal peace is upon us, and that the reign of goodwill and charity and liberty is drawing near. We have every reason for believing that in the future all disputes between the nations of the earth will be settled by peaceable means. But, boys and girls, remember that duties and responsibilities will come to you in life that will require courage of the highest and best type—moral courage; the courage of your convictions, the courage to do the right, the courage that has characterized the lives of our greatest and noblest men, such men as Luther and Wesley; the courage of Lincoln through the long siege of the Civil War; the courage of Theodore Roosevelt; the courage of Charles E. Hughes, representatives of the highest type of American citizenship; the courage that men need to persist in the face of great difficulties when they have taken up the great moral and political questions of the day. Oh, there will always be courage—courage never has been lacking and never will—courage, as we call the beneficent deed of daring. Never has there been courage lacking when duty calls soldiers to the field of battle, or to rescue men and women from burning buildings. That sort of courage has never been lacking. But what the twentieth century needs most is moral courage; courage to defend the weak against the strong; courage to champion the cause of the innocent if the whole world would pronounce them guilty; courage to help the cause that lacks assistance, and if necessary to stand alone for what we believe to be right. That is the courage the twentieth century needs most. And that kind of courage and that quality of patriotism will keep this Republic noble and make its future greater.

"In our gratitude and patriotism, let us not forget Him under whose watchful care and by whose guidance this nation has reached its present greatness; because our destiny he holds as in the hollow of his hand.

"When we consider the progress achieved by our great nation in the past years, we can look forward with a renewed hope that in the shadow of the Stars and Stripes we shall find peace and happiness forever."

Getting Under "Old Glory"—An Independence Day Scene at Mont-Lawn

A Christian Herald House-Boat Wrecked

MISSIONARY Z. CHAS. BEALS writes from Wuhu, China, on June 4: "You no doubt will be sorry to hear that our house-boat, the Christian Herald, was wrecked last night during a terrible hurricane. She was moored to a pontoon in the harbor, when the storm burst in all its fury. The ropes were snapped as threads and she smashed into the pontoon and her starboard side was broken in. She then turned over and filled with water, and now lies there submerged. This boat, as you know, was given to me by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers eight years ago, and she has been used in opening up four outstations, and in taking us to these places every month. We will miss her; but she was somewhat behind the times, as our work has extended so that we really need a boat that will get around quickly. Now that our boat is wrecked, we are compelled to ask you, dear readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, to help in buying another boat—a larger one—a motor boat preferred—for our work in this section of China. Please send us through the paper any help you feel the Lord would have you send.

"China is in a trying place at present. She has had short harvests for three years, and the people are getting discouraged and are looking around for a reason for this suffering. If the crops fail this year, also, we fear there will be uprisings."

An Ugly Business

TROUBLE follows in the wake of the brutal prize-fight, which the Governor of Nevada weakly permitted to profane the national patriotic holiday at Reno. It has already led to a number of homicides of the "race war" type in different parts of the country, where the negro element has hailed the triumph of the black pugilist as an evidence of superiority. And now we are threatened with a deluge of moving pictures of the Reno battle, which will still further inflame the savage instincts of the ignorant and may be productive of trouble on a much more extensive scale. This will probably be frustrated in many localities, where the decent element of the population object to such exhibitions as against public morals and especially harmful to the young. In a number of cities, the authorities have already accepted the popular protest and barred all exhibitions of pictures of the fight. Christian Endeavorers are conducting an active propaganda all over the country with this end in view, on the ground that such shows incite race hatred and riot and are as great an offense to public decency as the fight itself. Being multiplied indefinitely, they would of course be capable of far greater mischief. In many States, there is a statute law directed against vicious and degrading entertainments, and wherever such a law exists, the citizens have the remedy in their own hands by a simple legal proceeding. No right-thinking parent would wish his children to gloat over these delineations of savage brutality. If possible, the whole business should be stopped by an application to the courts wherever the attempt is made to force the pictures on the public. We are usually far too lax in our defense of public morals; but here is an evil which threatens to give serious trouble, unless it is promptly suppressed by the strong arm of the law, before it can get into actual operation.

Power and Weakness

A READER of this paper in South Swansea, Mass., writes us this letter:

> Your paper is a regular visitor in our home and highly prized. I was much surprised and pained to read in the issue of April 6 your editorial endorsement of President Taft's approval of the Hobson project to build two battleships each year. In this enlightened age, when a large percentage of the secular newspapers are advocating a curtailment of military and naval expenditures, it seems very inconsistent for a great magazine, bearing the name "Christian," to throw its vast influence in favor of so great and criminal a waste of our national resources.
> A few years ago a friend of mine, William Cullen Dennis, now United States agent at The Hague in the Venezuela case, in his graduating oration at Harvard plainly showed that war is a relic of barbarism; that primitive man held his family and property by brute force only; in the middle ages the feudal lords spent their resources in fortifying their estates against their neighbors; but in this enlightened age there is absolutely no excuse for war as a settlement of international difficulties.
> Can you find an intelligent person who will not admit that the military and naval outfit of any one of the great nations would be a sufficient police force for the whole world, provided the Powers should decree that all international disputes which cannot be settled otherwise must be referred to the Hague court for final decision?

This journal has always been a consistent advocate of peace and arbitration. By gradual stages, the civilized nations are moving in that direction; but it is yet very far off. For any government to reduce its armament to the point of weakness at the present time would be self-destruction. It would soon be invaded, overrun and conquered. We should love peace and work for it; but we must avoid a pusillanimous policy which would enfeeble us as a nation and leave us open to serious dangers at the hands of Powers that would not scruple to take advantage of our weakness. The world's peace must ultimately come through power, and not through weakness—a power that will be beneficent and which will make for righteousness and justice.

We believe THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was the first journal in America to advocate an international naval police force to preserve the world's peace. This was long before the Czar summoned the first Peace Congress. We are glad that the suggestion has taken root, as it indicates the ultimate plan that must be adopted when civilization has reached the proper stage of development. Under present conditions, however much we may desire and pray and work for peace and order, whether in communities or nations or throughout the globe, they can only be attained through the co-operation of strong moral and material forces. The power that can dictate to the nations, if it be a beneficent power, can do more toward advancing the cause of civilization and bringing world-peace than a score of weakling governments.

The Summer Sunday

WE have been told of an invalid who, as the traditional saying is, "enjoys very poor health." She is strong enough to enter into social gaiety during the week, but not strong enough to attend church. Her explanation is that the church is too cold in winter, too hot in summer, and always too crowded to permit her sitting still in comfort. The truth is, she declares, church-going makes her nervous. We have heard the same excuse for absenteeism from church in many instances. No doubt those who give it imagine that they are telling the truth. In reality, should they persuade themselves to go regularly to church, they would discover that they were helped and not hindered in finding the secret of the Sabbath rest. The summer Sunday need not all be spent in church. Part of it may be devoted to outdoor walks and talks, to singing and to reading for which the week has not afforded leisure. This is God's gift to man, a gift from the sky, dropped down to us week after week, "a day of rest and gladness, most beautiful, most bright."

A Picturesque Strike

FIFTY thousand garment and cloak workers, eighteen thousand of them women, went out on strike in New York a few days ago. This is the largest strike in a single trade the metropolis has ever known. They demand that their union be recognized, that the hours of labor be reduced to forty-eight per week and wages increased in all branches, the highest figure asked being $26 weekly for cutters and the lowest $14 for pressers. These workers have a strike fund of $70,000. They left their places singing and laughing, crowding the city's sidewalks like merry groups going on a holiday, and apparently indifferent to trouble or privation ahead. There was no effort at arbitration; the weather was fine, the treasury was full and they were simply bound to strike. They claim that unless their terms are granted the movement will spread, involving 100,000 cloak-makers in different cities. There are hopeful indications that the quarrel will shortly be settled amicably, although the strikers say they are prepared for a long siege. It will mean a loss of $1,000,000 per week in wages while the strike lasts—a sacrifice that must bear far more heavily on the workers than on any one else.

Another "New Religion"

ONCE more the brilliant but erratic faculty of the Divinity School of Chicago University has distinguished itself by announcing a "new religion." It does this at intervals, with about the same degree of regularity that the average popular astronomer proclaims the discovery of a new comet. According to the published accounts, the university organ, the Biblical World, in an article for which thirteen editors (oh, fateful number!) accept responsibility, defines what it calls "the new Christianity" as "the faith that is to release men's minds from the bonds of tradition and creed." Scientific study of the world and its problems is to be substituted for orthodox theology, and a religion that is "ethical, practical, scientific and altruistic" is presumably to displace the belief in the cross, the atonement and the resurrection. It is added, by way of a clincher, that when the tug of war comes between science and Scripture, Genesis and geology, the new Christianity will stand with geology and the old Christianity must go to the wall. We are reminded, however, that while the "thirteen" editors in question are confessedly responsible for this new and strange conglomerate, which they propose as a substitute for orthodox Christianity, Professor Shailer Mathews, the Dean of the same Divinity School, does not share their views. In a recent letter, he writes: "So far from believing that Jesus Christ was a mere intelligent Jew, I believe, and am teaching, that Jesus is the Christ of God, in whom God was reconciling the world to himself." Jesus, he holds, must be brought to the modern world by new methods, other than those that prevailed in earlier times. It would be a stretch of the imagination to attach any importance whatsoever to this latest lucubration of the talented thirteen were it not for the fact that it is liable to be unloaded upon the heads of defenseless students, whom by a singular fiction of fancy they are supposed to be training for the Christian ministry. Very likely a year hence, or even less, people will have forgotten the Chicago outburst, for, like the New Theology of Reginald Campbell of London and of our own Eliot of Harvard, it will have passed away, leaving no trace, while the old Gospel—with its firm faith in all the essentials of the old religion which has been tested and has met all the spiritual needs of past generations and which is even to-day regenerating the world—will go forward triumphantly on its divinely appointed mission.

General Notes

—PRESIDENT TAFT and his family are to enjoy a ten days' cruise on the Mayflower and will touch at Newport, Narragansett, Bar Harbor and other ports in New England.

—JACK LONDON is authority for the statement that many women attended the Reno prizefight, some of them sitting away back "in the boxes and others close to the ringside by the side of their husbands." We have a long way to travel yet before we can lay claim to the right kind of civilization.

—MILLIONAIRE AMATEURS are about to enter the field of aeroplane competition. Several of these enthusiasts are planning a flight from Washington to New York. There will be no money prizes, but a trophy will be awarded to the winner. The start will be made from the Capitol grounds and there will be competitors from half a dozen cities at least.

—BY A RECENT DECISION of the Supreme Court of Illinois Bible reading, hymn singing, prayer, and all form of religious exercises, are ruled out of the public schools of that State. The decision was procured by the Catholic residents of Winchester, Scott County. The court holds that the compulsory performance of such acts and exercises "constitutes a violation of the constitutional guaranty of the free enjoyment and exercise of religious profession and worship."

—OUR READERS will be greatly pleased to learn that there is now an excellent prospect of "Little Dora's" redemption being successfully accomplished. She was taken back into the "bush" (the heathen district in the interior) but now she has been allowed to return to the mission at Cape Palmas, Liberia. Missionary Perkins writes us: "It is now almost certain that we shall be able to settle matters satisfactorily to all concerned"—which, despite the delay, is very good news indeed.

—VIENNA HAS NEWS of a tragedy among the Jewish exiles in Russia. Two hundred of these unfortunates are said to have died of starvation and hardship following their recent expulsion from Russian cities. Twenty thousand men, women and children have been driven out of the territory where they had their homes and business and where most of them were born. The Moscow authorities have been especially brutal. Cities in the Jewish "pale" are now crowded with refugees, many of them almost penniless, and their only hope lies in emigration.

—IN A BRAND new epic, entitled: "The Battle of Summersales," the writer gives this vivid picture of scenes that are familiar to those who live in the neighborhood of big department or drygoods stores:

> The door flew wide before their rush, and with a fearsome din,
> They fought and strove and struggled till the windows tumbled in
> And there the clothes in serried rows, and bargains piled on,high.
> And heaps and heaps of odds and ends caught the enraptured eye
> They pounced and snatched, and grabbed and scratched, they tore the thing in two,
> And Roosevelt deeds of valor did these bargain-hunters do.
> But none so brave as Phyllis, with her hatpins in her hand,
> Who swept the choicest bargains from each counter and each stand.

The Ainus of Japan

ONE of the most interesting expositions of the year is the Japanese-British Exposition being held at Shepherd's Bush, near London. Japanese landscape gardeners have turned large tracts into flower gardens dotted with quaint Japanese houses, and there is a magnificent exhibit of the arts, crafts and industries of Japan. A party of Ainus, the people often called the oldest race in the world, who live in the northern part of Japan, are attracting much attention. There are but few of them left, though at one time they doubtless held a great part of Japan. It is thought that they will soon be extinct. It will be noticed that their faces bear but little resemblance to those of the Japanese. The Ainus are sometimes compared to the American Indians, both having held full sway over a country for centuries, only to be driven into a small part of their former territory by a stronger and progressive race. The stronger and victorious races have often been unjust, oppressive and murderous in spirit and action, as the white man was against the red man here, and yet God has overruled even the mistakes and sins of the Anglo-Saxon to the advancement of civilization and religion. Strange to say, the aborigines of almost all lands, when they are crowded back by the stronger arm, die almost as rapidly from civilization as from the bullet, like wild animals that pine and die when confined within pens. The Almighty in preparing the way for the establishment of his kingdom drove out the native tribes to make room for the children of Israel.

By little and little I will drive them out from before thee, until thou be increased, and inherit the land. (Ex. 23:30.)

Chief Justice Fuller Dies

Chief Justice Melville Weston Fuller died suddenly on the fourth day of July at his summer residence in Sorrento, Me., in his cottage, "Mainstay." Chief Justice Fuller was born in Augusta, Me., February 11, 1833, and was graduated from Bowdoin College in 1853. He attended lectures at the Harvard Law School and received the degree of LL.D. from the Northwestern University, Bowdoin College, Harvard, Yale and Dartmouth Colleges. The five daughters he left are Mrs. Hugh Wallace of Tacoma, Mrs. W. H. White of Chicago, Mrs. F. S. Beecher of Tarrytown, N. Y., Mrs. R. F. Mason and Mrs. L. Nathaniel Francis of Washington. There were no sons in the family. He fell into his last sleep in the arms of his daughter, Mrs. Francis. He was appointed by President Cleveland, and occupied the position twenty-two years. He had the third rank for length of service as the head of the highest tribunal in America. Chief Justice Marshall presided over the Court for thirty-four years and Chief Justice Taney for twenty-eight years. There have been a number of most important cases decided by the Court during his administration. The income tax was declared unconstitutional. The doctrine that the Constitution follows the flag in the cases fixing the status of the Philippines was enunciated. Other cases of great importance were decided. The President of the United States in a letter to Mrs. Francis gives a tender and just estimate of the great jurist: "Your father honored me with his friendship for twenty years, which enabled me to know his sweet and lovable nature and his noble character as a man. He was a great jurist, noted for his experience, thought and courage of action. His career entitles him to the gratitude of his fellow countrymen, and he leaves a memory of which his family may well be proud." Within a little more than a year four vacancies have occurred on the Supreme Bench, three through death and one through retirement. It is more than likely that Governor Hughes, who has already been named as a successor to Justice Brewer, will be called to occupy the place made vacant by Chief Justice Fuller. Justice Fuller's death recalls his own words expressed at the centenary of the Supreme Court a score of years ago: "Judges will be appointed," said he, "and will pass. One generation rapidly succeeds another. But whoever comes and whoever goes the court remains, keeping alive, through many centuries we shall not see, the light that burns with a constant radiance upon the high altar of American constitutional justice." The head of the highest court in this land was a true Christian man and regulated his life and his decisions by the will of the Supreme Judge of all men. He attended services at church and enjoyed them the very day before he died. He had an ear to this command to the judges of old:

Take heed what ye do: for ye judge not for man, but for the Lord, who is with you in the judgment. (II. Chron. 19:6.)

Snake-Eating Bird

Two secretary birds, the first of their species ever brought to this country, were received from Africa at the Bronx Zoological Gardens in New York the other day. They cost $100 each. They are of the hawk family, four feet in height, with long legs, slate-colored feathers and long quills protruding from the back of the head. They have the stride of an ostrich, but their peculiarity is that they are the deadly enemy of snakes and hunt and destroy them with great eagerness. The other day, Director Hornaday, Professor Ditmars and L. S. Crandall, the acting curator of birds at the Bronx Zoo, made a test to see whether these African birds actually had the snake-destroying instinct. One of the birds was put in the ostrich run, where a garter snake was thrown to it. It snapped the garter snake up and swallowed it in an instant. Then a large deadly moccasin was introduced. The snake immediately recognized an enemy and undertook to crawl away. The bird took three or four long steps and overhauled the snake. The latter coiled itself up and reared its head for a stroke, when the secretary reached out with its long right claw, and caught the snake around the neck. The serpent coiled its body around the long leg of the bird. With its other claw the bird carefully unwound the coils and then proceeded to master its victim. With its sharp bill it picked out both of the reptile's eyes. It then threw its enemy into the air and caught it as it descended. It played with the snake as a cat would with a mouse and pecked it into submission. Then the secretary bird swallowed the monstrous snake whole before the life had left it and walked about the lot with a look of perfect contentment. There are some rude tribes that use snakes for food, but they are about the last thing in the world that a civilized man would think of touching as an article of diet. The serpent in the Scripture is looked upon as the fountain of every evil spiritual influence, and the mastery of the moccasin by the secretary bird reminds us of the victory which is given to the child of God over the spiritual evils that infest his pathway.

The Ainus at the British-Japanese Exposition

Behold, I give unto you power to tread on serpents and scorpions, and over all the power of the enemy: and nothing shall by any means hurt you. (Luke 10:19.)

Wreck from Misunderstanding Orders

Nineteen persons were killed and twenty more injured in a collision on the Big Four Railroad near Middletown, O., the other afternoon. There was a head-on collision between the freight train and a New York flyer. There was an awful crash, a grinding of heavy cars to splinters, and the fearful harvest of death. The accident was the result of the misunderstanding of orders. Trains are run in such great numbers and at such a terrific speed that awful accidents occur when every reasonable precaution is taken, but the crowding and swiftness of the trains ought to lead to more than usual caution and to more than is taken on the average railroad. There is no monetary consideration which justifies such a risk and wreckage as is so common. Fortunately the inventions and public requirements of the devices of safety make the massacre less than it otherwise would be. What a fearful wreckage there is in the moral and religious world by the failure of those who are entrusted with responsibility to properly apprehend the orders from divine headquarters! There must be no dulness in the spiritual apprehension of duty or there will be crashes and massacres laid at our door. We are to be judged not only for the evil we intend to do but for that which occurs by our carelessness in the discharge of duty. The spiritual vigilance which is so necessary was commanded by our Saviour in these words:

And what I say unto you I say unto all, watch. (Mark 13:37.)

Provides for Pastor's Widow

Soon after the death of Rev. Dr. William H. Richards, pastor of the Brick Presbyterian Church, in New York City, a committee was formed to raise a fund of $60,000 from the members of the congregation, for the support of the widow and her children. The other day the committee presented that amount to Mrs. Richards. She was not aware that the subscription was being taken until the handsome sum was placed in her hands. Mrs. Richards is now living at Bridgeport, Conn., where her husband is buried. The elder of her two sons was recently married and the younger one is a student in Yale. Her three daughters live at home with her. The congregation did the same thing, raising a purse of $60,000, for the widow of the Rev. Dr. Maltbie R. Babcock, who was Dr. Richards' predecessor. The munificent action of this rich church is beautiful, and rare as it is beautiful. It is not an act of remorse for having withheld money due their pastors while living, for the church allows a very generous salary. It is the deep-seated love and gratitude of a people toward those who have rendered them the highest service that can be rendered on earth in care for their souls. The salary of the average minister is pitifully and wickedly small. Sacrifices are demanded of him and his family out of proportion to those that are made by the average member of the congregation. The meager provision made for the support of superannuated ministers and for the widows and orphans of their brothers who have been translated, calls for mortification, penitence and reform. Fortunately there is an improvement among almost all denominations in this particular over the past, and it is to be hoped that the example set by the Brick Presbyterian Church and by many other churches in larger and smaller communities in a more humble way, will be followed by the multitudes of loyal church members who love their pastors, but who have not as yet set to work necessary organizations for their adequate support in time of need. This singular affection for the pastor, which might naturally lead to the provision which we have mentioned, is enjoined by Paul in his letter to the Thessalonians in these words:

And we beseech you, brethren, to know them which labor among you, and are over you in the Lord, and admonish you; and to esteem them very highly in love for their work's sake. (I. Thes. 5:12-13.)

A Moving Mountain

The Rossberg, a mountain 5,190 feet high, is again in motion on the eastern side, threatening with destruction nearly a score of villages and hamlets. A number of forests and farms have already been swept away. In 1806 part of this mountain fell and killed five hundred people. The present motion of the mountain, which is causing such consternation, began after the recent earthquake in Switzerland. The earth is in rapid motion around the sun and on its own axis, and is in one kind of motion or another within itself. The settlement of this mountain and the perils of nature and human life, all drive us toward the immutable and everlasting, into the heart of infinite love.

For the mountains shall depart and the hills be removed; but my kindness shall not depart from thee, neither shall the covenant of my peace be removed, saith the Lord that hath mercy on thee. (Isa. 54:10.)

TO REBUILD THE McAULEY MISSION

THE old Jerry McAuley Mission is to be rebuilt. For more than thirty-seven years, the famous old building known as No. 316 Water Street, New York City, has stood as the scene and centre of an unremitting, unceasing activity in the cause of fallen humanity. From the moment of its inception this work has been attended by divine blessing. Under its founder, under the consecrated labors of Samuel Hopkins Hadley, and under the devoted efforts of John H. Wyburn, the present superintendent, the work of human rescue and reclamation has never slackened or languished. Never has the old Water Street Mission reported so large a percentage of its converts standing fast as now. Its loyal leaders believe that the most glorious chapter in its history is yet to be written.

For several years past it has been evident that the acquisition of more commodious premises for the mission was an absolute necessity. The old mission has outgrown its quarters, and this is not surprising. All over the habitable globe, men are found to-day telling how they found freedom and pardon through the blood and power of Jesus Christ in the old Water Street Mission and how they found release from the slavery of drink. It was truly said by the late S. H. Hadley, "the drunkard is more welcome here than the sober man; the criminal more welcome than the honest man," for the work of the mission is among the lost.

In the main, the men who come to Water Street are men who have long before forfeited their rights —rights to confidence, rights to fellowship, rights to co-operation. Some by sheer folly and perverseness, some by the tragic heritage received at birth. By far the greater number of those who come there have been the bondslaves of strong drink. They belonged to the wreckage of society—human rubbish, fit only to be cast out; but the great joy of the workers in the Old Jerry McAuley Mission is to know that by and through their efforts this drink slavery is constantly being robbed of its victims.

Dr. A. T. Pierson once said that the story of Water Street reads like a new chapter in the Acts of the Apostles. Through more than three decades modern miracles have taken place there. Men apparently fallen beyond recall have been redeemed and transformed, for Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, to-day and forever.

The work has fallen into good hands. Its faithful superintendent, John H. Wyburn, is a worthy successor of the men who did such glorious work there for Christ and humanity in the past.

When the present mission building was erected, thirty-seven years ago, nearly all the material utilized was second-hand. The structure is now greatly dilapidated; the plumbing is worn out and unsanitary, and the old, shaky building is unwholesome and altogether too cramped for the mission work. For several years the workers have been hampered by these conditions and even more by lack of room to carry on the regular operations of the mission, which have been steadily growing.

The trustees of the mission, therefore, have decided to raise one hundred thousand dollars and to build a more commodious structure to meet the increased requirements of the work. The new premises will be erected on the site now occupied by the present structure, and also on a vacant lot adjoining. This lot Jerry McAuley secured in 1876, when the existing mission building replaced the old, wooden dance hall that was opened and consecrated to God's work September 25, 1872. The plans have been approved by the trustees and are now ready for estimate and building. They have been prepared by an architect, who was not only a personal friend of Jerry McAuley and his wife, but who has been identified with the mission since it first opened its doors. It is hoped that the new quarters will be a model for rescue work of the particular character for which the old Water Street Mission stands.

As almost everybody knows, the majority of the men who attend the Water Street Mission meetings are "down-and-outs"—outcasts without a home. This is precisely the kind of man who is welcome—the kind of man for whom the very work was established. They are compelled to make their home in the cheap lodging houses on the Bowery, which are full of evil surroundings and temptations to vice. The new mission will have a place of refuge to offer these poor human waifs during their leisure hours. At present only a very limited number of converts can be taken and made members of the superintendent's household at one time—usually some four or five. It has been proved that the men who are thus sheltered in the initial stages of their Christian experience, stand firm and are not liable to backslide. In the new building there will be accommodations for upward of sixty men. Single rooms, showers, and lavatories will be placed on each floor, and there will be large dining rooms and kitchen accommodations. There will also be open porches, a roof garden and a conservatory and solarium, where flowers can be raised for the mission sick and for hospital visitations. There will also be a hospital where loving hands will tend the sick.

One of the most effective ministries in Water Street (made possible through the generosity of the president of the board of trustees, Mr. John H. Huyler) is the Thursday night supper, at which coffee and sandwiches are served to a great crowd of homeless, starving men. For this feature a large airy room will be provided, which at other times can be utilized as a workroom.

The proposed new mission building will be five stories in height, fire-proof and germ-proof, sanitary walls, ceilings and floors. The sanitary treatment of the floors, walls and ceiling will be equal to that of any modern hospital service. An electric passenger elevator will run to the top floor, where main dining room, laundry and kitchen will be located. The superintendent's office and janitor's quarters will be on the mezzanine floor over the entrance.

A man's birthplace is to him always a sacred spot —a shrine to which periodically he reverently returns. But dearer is the place where a man knows he was born again—that place where there came into his soul the throb of the new life. Hundreds of converts can point to the spot in the old Water Street Mission where Christ spoke pardon to their souls. All who have knelt at the mercy seat in Water Street will be glad to know that the location of the benches where penitents are asked to kneel will be the same as of old. The entire south wall, with its memorials of the sainted workers of the past, will also be retained.

It is hoped that the new mission building will be completed and ready for occupancy in time for the next anniversary. It is confidently believed that the innumerable friends of the Old Jerry McAuley Mission throughout this land and in lands across the seas will count it a pleasure as well as a privilege to aid in the effort to give the mission a new and suitable home, which would be a great centre of Gospel and rescue work. The mission workers make appeal to all who are in sympathy with their labors and who love the old mission and its soul-winning record, to help them in their effort to give it a new home and thus to open a door to still wider opportunities of usefulness and Christian service. Any gifts for this purpose sent to the treasurer of the Water Street Mission will be welcomed.

The Proposed New McAuley Mission

A NOTABLE "DIAMOND WEDDING"

FROM a reader in Brantford, Ontario, Can., we have received this interesting account of a recent event in that section of the Dominion:

"The 'Diamond Wedding' and family reunion of Mr. and Mrs. Syer, subscribers to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for a quarter of a century, took place lately. Seldom does it fall to the lot of a married couple to pursue the journey of life together for a period of sixty years. Yet this is the record which these two worthy citizens of the town of Wyoming, Ont., were privileged to celebrate at their home on November 27 last. Their children and grandchildren were present, three generations participating in the joyous occasion. The happy old couple have both passed the fourscore mark, Mr. Syer being eighty-one and Mrs. Syer eighty-two years of age. Both are active and take a great interest in life, especially in the lives of their immediate family, which numbers ten, all grown men and women, three daughters and seven sons. A special feature for thankfulness was the fact that the whole family, father and mother included, have been spared to each other so long. Dinner was served at 2 o'clock, after which an illuminated address was read by the eldest son, and this was followed by the presentation of a well-filled purse. The family all attended church next morning, Sunday. Reference to the celebration was made by the minister and a hymn was sung in honor of the occasion. Mr. and Mrs. Syer have received congratulations from many friends in different parts of the country.

—THE NINTH SEASON of the summer work of the Lemon Hill Association of Philadelphia opened at Fairmount Park on Memorial Sunday. There was a great gathering under the big canvas tent—adults and children. Rev. James B. Ely, who has conducted these services ever since their inauguration, delivered the opening address. Dr. Meninger of Lancaster made a historical address, and the Lemon Hill Chorus gave several patriotic songs. In the mixed congregation were Americans, Hungarians, Poles and many other nationalities.

A CROSS OF FRILLS

By Grace Boteler Sanders

"IT is absolutely necessary, Rob."

Nell Hargrave's black eyes snapped as she spoke.

"I am positively ashamed to look eople in the face. Why? Because I ave been entertained by every one in wn and have never paid even one of y social obligations. Such things are eally debts of honor. They are just as nportant as the dealers' accounts, hich you insist upon paying the first every month."

Robert Hargrave frowned.

"I do not think I have refused you any things, Nellie," he began. "Perhaps it would have been better for me I had. The expense is not the only nsideration. There is too much entertaining in Ripley. Half the women the receptions given in our 'set' last eek, I venture to say, deprived their milies of a beefsteak more than once, provide the funds for a handsome arty gown. Half of them went home gossip over the backyard fence for he next fortnight, ridiculing what me other woman wore, what some ther woman said. There was breathed here scarcely a word of literature, usic or art; scarcely a word of hisry, science or religion. Their precious time is wasted, frittered away on rills. Ripley is an old town. There re citizens here who inherited their ealth. There are retired farmers ho have settled down with their ives to spend the dollars which they massed by hard labor. I am only bank clerk at present, but my salary ught to keep us in comparative comort, for we started without debt. But he last few weeks, try as I would, I ould not make ends meet. I promsed several of our creditors that I ould pay them the first of the year. hey have agreed to wait. If you hould indulge in any further extravaance, it would ruin me financially."

Robert Hargrave walked back to his ooks, and left his young wife standng by the desk, consternation written ll over her pretty face. The bank as deserted except for the head bookeeper, who worked busily away, seemngly seeing nothing but the rows of igures before him.

Nell Hargrave buckled her handome furs about her neck and stepped ut into the snowy street.

"Who would have thought that Rob ould act like this?" she grumbled to erself. "I knew he despised 'funcions,' as he calls them, but I did not dream of his actually forbidding me to ive one; just as if I were a spoiled hild!"

Nell's dainty chin unconsciously was ip-tilted.

"I don't know what to do," she nused on. "I owe everybody in town. f I don't pay my debts pretty soon, ocial ostracism stares me in the face. Besides, I have engaged Dinah to help ne, invited the ladies to serve refreshnents, had my dress made, and, for all I know, Alma Chapman may have nade out half my list. It is all over own what a swell affair I am to give. I can't tell them that my husband won't let me."

Nell stopped in front of a jeweler's window to admire some oyster-forks which she had been intending to purchase. A sudden idea came into her mind as she gazed at them.

"I believe I will just go ahead as if he had not said a word. If I don't tell him until a few hours before the reception, he cannot help himself. What if he wouldn't give me the money? I can have things charged."

Still combating with her better self, she walked boldly into the store.

"Those forks which I was looking at a few days ago are reduced in price. I see. I believe I will let you send me down a dozen. Charge them, please."

The excitement of the battle was upon her, and she hurried to the stationer's to select her invitations, and to the caterer to consult with him as to prices and decorations.

In the entrancing occupation of the hour, the disagreeable scene at the bank was forgotten. With the delighted abandon of a child, Nell Hargrave went deeper and deeper, until, when she arrived at home, and found the pile of parcels waiting for her, the thought of the bills which were yet to come made her heart fairly stand still.

"I am afraid I was—a bit reckless," she faltered, hurrying to show the things away before her husband's coming. "I won't tell Rob yet. Yes, I'll wait until the party is over and then have all the storm at once. It is supper time now. I do wonder where he is."

She lighted the blue gas flame and prepared a light supper, as she had done many times lately when arriving home late from some scene of gaiety.

"I, and I alone, am responsible," said Mrs. Hargrave

"I do neglect my house since I have been gadding so much," she murmured regretfully, as she surveyed the bare table. "Poor old Rob! I am going to give this party, pay my debts and quit—if—if I can! This thing is a little like gambling. If you once get into the whirlpool, you can never stop. My, but it's snowing hard! I wish that man would come."

With an impatient gesture, Nell shook up the softest cushion, lighted the red-shaded lamp and threw the shutters open wide that the cheerful rays might illuminate the path outside.

Much pleased with the effect, the young wife looked lovingly about the little house, and sighed from pure satisfaction.

"This is November—our anniversary month," she soliloquized, dreamily resting her little poppy-red slippers on the tiled hearth." Just a year ago, we were married in the little stone church. How I hated that clerking! It just seemed as if I was in heaven, when I didn't have to trudge off to the store every morning.

"Rob has been good to me. If he makes a perfect record this year, they have promised to promote him. That would mean a bigger salary and we can pay these little accounts without feeling it. I do not see how they could help but give the place to him. He is surely brighter and more faithful than Sims, that slow-poke with the dowdy wife. I'm not going to worry myself, or him either, with nonsensical problems. There he comes!"

Stamping feet upon the veranda announced the coming of the man of the house.

"It's snowing fast, Nellie," he began cheerfully, as soon as he saw the smiling wife, who ran to greet him. "I'll take off my coat and shake it. I guess I had better go around the house, on second thought."

Robert Hargrave looked longingly into the pretty parlor, where the brilliant flame was burning fiercely over the gas logs, then back at the unmarked path around the house.

"No, you won't!" Nell was seized with a sudden repentance. She threw her arms around his neck and drew him into the room.

"It's a pity if you have to go sneaking around to the back door of your own house like a tramp!" she ejaculated indignantly. "As if there was anything too good for you!"

She noticed guiltily the tired lines about his mouth, the drooping eyes and humped shoulders. "You are working too hard," she crooned, leading him to a chair and bending over to kiss his forehead.

Robert Hargrave smiled gravely at the sweet face above him.

"But this little woman needs luxuries. There is nothing too good for her, but I find that there is a limit to the money I earn. Have you forgotten the days when you worked for a 'bite and a sup'? Don't you remember how hard it was?"

"Indeed I do!" Nell patted the white hand which held hers; then raised it impulsively to her lips. "I was just thinking before you came, how thankful I am for my home and—you. I've the best boy in the world, Bobby Burns, and I know it. Now why were you late to supper? 'Fess up!"

"By working late, I can do an extra set of books. Todds have no accountant now, so they gave me the chance, and by working after hours I can pay at least a part of our bill there."

These gentle words fanned the repentant glow which had already sprung up in Nell Hargrave's heart. Tempted to tell her husband of the purchases which the closet had hidden and of the various deceptions which she had practised upon him, Nell fell sobbing to her knees.

"Rob—I—I—" Her small frame shook so that she could not speak.

"I am sorry I was obliged to refuse you to-day, sweetheart." The husband supposed his harsh words at the bank had caused this outburst. "I cannot explain the reason to you now, but I know you will believe me when I say this is no trivial matter. I would give you the world if I could——"

"I know you would," interrupted Nell, putting her hand over his mouth. "You are an angel and I am a despicable little sneak. I am ashamed of myself, Rob, hut I do love you."

Like a shot she was gone. Twenty minutes later they sat down to the table, where a smoking supper was served by a red-eyed, tearful girl.

The battle between love and pride waged fiercely in Nell Hargrave's heart all night long. The next day Alma Chapman called.

"I am on my way to Mrs. Gordon's musical. Are you not going, dear?"

"Rob does not feel very well. I thought I would stay at home."

"Anything serious?"

"No; headache and a severe cold."

"The idea!" laughed Mrs. Chapman airily. "Nell, you are so old-fashioned! A person would think your honeymoon had just begun."

Alma pulled out her fan, a gorgeous sandalwood affair, and waved it indolently. "Have you set the date?"

"I have almost made up my mind to postpone it indefinitely," faltered Nell. "Rob objects to it seriously. He doesn't believe in such affairs, and then he thinks he can hardly afford it, just now."

"It is rather late for him to be finding it out."

There was a sarcastic, metallic ring in Alma's soft, mellow tone. "After every one in town has entertained his wife two or three times, he wisely concludes that he doesn't believe in receptions! If you did not intend to return the courtesy, you had no right to accept the invitations, my dear. As to your husband affording it! He makes more than George. I'd like him to tell me he could not afford it. Wouldn't I squelch him! It is turning out just as Agnes Quarles prophesied that it would. You know she was engaged to Rob before you were," added Alma maliciously. "She said he was so stingy he would lead you a dog's life."

"I do not care to have you repeat such conversations to me, Alma," interposed Nell stiffly. "My husband is not stingy and he did not forbid me to entertain. He simply objects to getting head over heels in debt, as some folks in this town have done."

Mrs. Chapman winced uneasily.

"If Agnes thinks him so terrible," continued Nell, "I wonder why she tried so hard to get him. Must you be going?"

With a polite bow, Nell Hargrave accompanied her visitor to the door. The very same day an engraver received his order for two hundred reception cards.

End of the Great World's Conference

By DELAVAN LEONARD PIERSON

THERE has probably never been held in the history of the world a more important and representative religious conference than that which closed in the beautiful city of Edinburgh on June 23. It was nothing less than a peace conference of war—peace, because the purpose was to bring into working harmony all the forces of Protestant Christendom in obedience to the spirit of our Lord's intercessory prayer; war, since the subject under discussion was how to conquer or win the whole wide world for Jesus Christ in obedience to his command.

Three large halls holding from 1,500 to 2,500 each, and, at various times, many churches, were used to accommodate the thousands that flocked together day after day to consider the missionary problems or to listen to the burning words of noble missionaries and other able advocates and leaders of world-wide Christian work. All branches of the Protestant Church were represented in the councils and on the platform—even the Roman and Greek Catholics were tenderly dealt with. On the opening night an address was made by the Archbishop of Canterbury, the primate of the established church of England. There were also numberless other bishops of every degree of height and breadth—bishops of England, America and Europe, Methodist, Moravian, and home and foreign missionary bishops. There were lords and ladies and knights among the delegates and speakers. The chairman of the conference committee was Lord Balfour of Burleigh, and one of the vice-chairmen was Sir Andrew Fraser, recently lieutenant-governor of Bengal. The other lords were too numerous to mention.

Noted leaders from every Protestant land were also present.

Famous missionaries came from every quarter of the non-Christian world; there were Dr. Arthur H. Smith, author of Chinese Characteristics; Rev. William Goforth, who has been so widely used in revivals in China; Dr. Samuel Moffatt, the "Great Heart" and "Great Head" of Korean Missions; there were Rev. J. L. Dearing of Japan, Dr. S. M. Zwemer of Arabia, Bishop Thoburn of India, Bishop Roots of China and Bishop Brent of the Philippines; Dr. Samuel Jessup of Syria and Dr. Andrew Watson of Cairo; Dr. Cook and Archdeacon Walker of Uganda; Rev. W. N. T. Gairner of Cairo and Dr. Karl Kumm of the Sudan.

Among the most picturesque figures in the meetings were the native Christians who came as living testimonies to the power of the Gospel to redeem men and women from heathenism. There was the venerable form of Dr. Chatterji, a convert from Hinduism and now given the degree of D.D. by the University of Edinburgh. Japanese and Koreans, Chinese, Burmese and Indians, Africans and Syrians—many in their native costumes—came together to remind us of the great ingathering, when at last from every nation and tongue and tribe, from the East and West and North and South, men and women will come and worship before the throne of God.

The conference itself was notable for the fact that the reports had been prepared in advance and were submitted in printed form to each delegate before the opening meeting. No time was lost in reading these reports, but they were used as a basis for discussion. Each speech was strictly limited to seven minutes, and we doubt if there ever was a more remarkable series of seven-minute speeches in all the history of conventions. Men spoke from wide experience, deep conviction and after careful thought. Their remarks were packed full of meat as if compressed in an hydraulic press. Wit and humor were not wanting, and the lack of all asperity, discourtesy or discord was notable.

In the main assembly hall of the United Free Church of Scotland the twelve hundred delegates, and as many other missionaries and visitors as could crowd into the galleries, sat daily from 9.45 in the morning until 1; from 2.30 until 4.30 in the afternoon and from 8 till 9.30 in the evening. They discussed one by one the reports of the eight commissions: First, the distribution of missionaries, the fields yet unoccupied and the work remaining to be accomplished. Second, the native Church in the mission fields, its strength, training and future. Third, education in the mission fields. Four the content of the Gospel message non-Christian religions and the b method of presenting it. Fifth, m sions and governments, with the re tion of missionaries to their own a native governments in times of mass cre and times of peace. Sixth, operation and unity among denomir tions and societies. Seventh, t training of missionaries. Eigh the home base of missions, and how develop and direct the interest of t Christians in Christian lands.

Turning to the men, I cried: "What is this?" and pointed to the strange thing now descending quickly toward us. The men in an excited way talked all together. I could see that it was something very unusual, and they seemed to be very much frightened. My Christian boy, Ke Tai, came to me to keep me from being alarmed. He carefully explained, but using many words I had never heard before. I listened, more mystified than ever; whether it were a mob or an uprising I did not know. He saw that I did not understand, and so at great length and with many more strange words, not in my vocabulary, he tried to enlighten my bewildered mind.

Nearer came the menacing mob, and above the clanging of brass, the yelling and wailing arose in an unearthly roar. Alone, at midnight, on the dark mountain pass, I stood and faced—what? I knew not, but certainly something terrifying and awful. My heart was filled with horror and a strange, unutterable longing for my homeland and mother swept over my heart. Had my time come to go? It might be indeed so.

With faltering voice I insisted again: "Can't you tell me in a few words what it is? I will not fear." This time the boy understood what it was that I needed, and made reply:

"Yes; it is a nobleman who has departed from this world." It was a great funeral, nothing more. Midnight is the favorite time for the procession to the grave. The darkness will help to keep away the evil spirits, so they think; the bells and drums are used also to frighten away the malign demons by the noise. The loud wailing and piercing cries were from the large crowd of hired mourners.

I had my chair-bearers carry the chair to one side and hide it among the brushes and tall grasses, while, unseen, I watched the weird procession. The gaudy catafalque passed and the drunken crowd, wildly gesticulating and screaming to the top of their voices. There were horrible, grinning images, and false faces, which in the faint, ghostly light all seemed unreal and as though here was, indeed, a regiment from the lower regions. With a shudder, I buried my face in my hands and sobbed aloud.

We remained hidden until the last straggler h passed, then hurriedly entering the chair, I urg my bearers on towards Seoul. We reached the a cient gates in three hours and my overtaxed cooli were only too glad to be rid of their burden.

Years have passed since that night in the mou tain; I have since seen many heathen funerals, b never again have I felt the horror that was broug to my soul that night, as I hid among the grass while the turbulent waves of heathen superstiti surged about me.

Housekeeping in Warm Weather

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

Summer Pests

AS I write the words there returns to me across the long years the memory of a summer in Virginia when life was a burden and housekeeping an exasperation because of a pest of tiny red ants. These minute specimens of the insect world were far too numerous to count and they invaded every corner of the house, swarming over the pantries, infesting the bureau drawers and creeping in battalions across the dining-room tables. I cannot remember how they were exterminated, but I do know that the neighbors were called into council, that the old black mammies who had fought with rats from their childhood had remedies to offer, and that though the conflict was stubborn victory perched upon our banners at last. The trouble must have been general and not limited to our home, for I recall going to an afternoon tea and declining a piece of sponge cake because I saw that the ants were calmly walking across its surface. "Ah," said the lady beside me, "you cannot make up your mind to eat that cake, but I can. I have a soul above ants."

We found it necessary to insulate every portable refrigerator and other repository in which food was kept by standing them in jars filled with water. We sprinkled borax plentifully upon the shelves and we waged a war with no quarter against the tiny intruders. Finally we routed them. Among the worst pests of the summer, pests with which the housekeeper should do battle, flies are more to be dreaded than ants either black or red. It should go without saying that windows and doors carefully screened are an essential of summer housekeeping. Absolutely there is no excuse for the presence of flies inside the house when wire screens will bar their way from the world outdoors. Mosquito netting tacked across windows serves the purpose of wire, but it soon becomes limp and a blast of wind may tear it down. One might better do without many finer things in favor of having a well-screened house. Flies are distinctly unwholesome and unclean. They bring contagion with them, and are the prolific source of many an evil disease. As for the ubiquitous mosquito, against whom an indictment must be declared on the score of disease as well as of incessant annoyance and disturbance of sleep, screens are a protection against its ravages. They are not invariably effectual, this minute and torturing creature sometimes squeezing through apertures incredibly small. The mosquito cannot be routed by an individual. States and municipalities should spend money lavishly in destroying the conditions in which the mosquito breeds. The thing has been done. It was done in New Orleans, and it might be done in every other habitat of the mosquito, if strong measures were taken to destroy the laboratories whence mosquitoes come by the million. Another summer pest which one hesitates to name are simply disgraceful if they obtain lodgment in your home. Residents in apartment houses, even when these are most luxurious and most beautifully appointed, are troubled by periodical outbreaks of bed-bugs, water-bugs, cockroaches and the like. In fact, a professional insect exterminator appears weekly or monthly in many New York apartment houses, ready to exercise his vocation. Presumably a similar expert goes about on the same job in other large towns and cities. The price of immunity from pests like these, if one's home be in a crowded city whose residents are more or less nomadic, is eternal vigilance.

What Shall We Eat in Summer?

Catering for the household in summer is not a difficult task provided the family are of one mind. Nature furnishes fruits in abundance, and a diet largely composed of milk and fruit, good bread and butter and fresh vegetables is the one to be recommended in the summer season. Very little meat is needed in summer. Hot joints and highly spiced food are as great mistakes as might be the wearing of a fur coat. The custom of a hearty American breakfast, once universal, has become obsolete, and the European breakfast of rolls and coffee, or coffee with toast and marmalade, a little fruit and a cereal at discretion, is at present popular. To prepare breakfast with coffee and rolls and boiled eggs is an easy affair. The other meals of the day may likewise be simple. If there are men whose work requires them to have a heartier diet, they should be provided for at dinner or supper. Americans need not be ashamed of liking pie as their forefathers did. A toothsome berry pie is a dish fit to set before a king. The summer housekeeper may decline to make pastry oftener than on Saturday morning, and when the supply of the Saturday baking is exhausted she should serve the family with uncooked fruit until the return of the baking day.

THE LOVE OF THE FLAG

Forever the flag of my country for me!
Is the cry that resoundeth from mount and to sea.
It ringeth from Africa's far distant shore;
And where Fuji-yama's white vapors outpour.

The flag of his country each true heart loves well,
It honors each patriot glories to tell.
But of all the bright flags that on earth ever flew,
There is none that compares with our red, white and blue.

—S. P. Bread and butter plates are a convenience and so are the small knives that accompany them. You were right in using the latter, although the other guests did not do so.

—BERTHA AND RUTH. A young man working on a small salary is not usually in funds to pay for a carriage when he escorts a young woman to a party, nor is it quite fair, if he happen to be the only man in a group going to a concert, to allow him to pay the collective car fares. As a rule, at such times what is known as Dutch treat is the better course to be insisted upon by girls.

About Comfort

THERE are usually two opinions as to the best method of keeping a house comfortable and cool during a heated term. Possibly there are three. Every one is agreed that something must be done to alleviate and mitigate the suffering that comes as an accompaniment to torrid temperature. We cannot indeed compare ourselves with the missionaries in India and Africa when we think of the faintness and headache induced by the fierce tropical heat of the sun. With us there is frequently a cool interval after several days of intense warmth. A thunder shower is the advance agent of a coming cold wave, or in the daily newspaper the weather bureau gives out a hint of relief. We are not obliged to face ninety or one hundred days in which the mercury mounts to one hundred degrees, while the sky is like burnished copper, and only they who rise before the dawn are able to undertake anything like real work. Yet we do have extremes which are trying to soul and body, and so the question comes home to us: how are we to keep the house comfortable for the babies, the old people, and the sick?

One method, probably the best, is to open every window and door early in the day, flooding the house with the morning coolness. As the sun mounts higher, close every window and shutter and draw down the shades. In the South I have tried this plan successfully. After five o'clock in the afternoon windows and doors may again be opened and cool air admitted.

Another plan apt to be favored by the man of the house, if his advice is asked, is to keep everything open and allow the breeze, if there is any, to have a full sweep through the entire place.

Still another, and this commends itself as sensible, is to minimize the amount of fire in the range. If cooking is done upon a gas stove and the laundry work reduced to its lowest terms, this procedure will certainly aid in reducing the amount of indoor heat. Everything must be done to keep an invalid's room as cool as possible in sultry weather, and if the patient have temperature, the blood rising to fever heat, sheets rung out of cold water and hung in the doorways may aid in bringing a little coolness. Above all things, do not fret. The little ones should stay in the pleasantest part of the house and be very lightly clothed. Neither they nor their elders gain in the slightest degree by complaints of discomforts. Prickly heat with children may be soothed by frequent baths and a liberal use of talcum powder.

Another Golden Wedding

On February 22, Washington's birthday, the golden wedding anniversary of our friends, Mr. and Mrs. J. N. Klock, was celebrated at the home of their youngest son, Mr. M. L. Klock, Bath, N. Y. Mr. and Mrs. Klock have four children and four grandchildren. Thus far death has not invaded their circle. The occasion of the golden wedding was auspicious, a poem written for the happy pair was read, there was music by a grandson, and numerous presents were received. The maiden name of Mrs. Klock was Irene Strough.

Good Old Rover

A poor wee morsel of humanity, just a little waif left to die by an unnatural mother, was found nearly frozen stiff, one winter's day in Hoboken. The babe would not have been found at all but for Rover, an immense St. Bernard, who saw the child, protected him as best he could with his shaggy body, and by powerful deep-resonant barks brought his mistress to the baby's aid. And there are people who do not like dogs!

Questions and Answers

C. O., Toronto, Can. Why is Virginia, U. S. A., referred to as the "Old Dominion"?

Virginia is called the Old Dominion because at one time it was recognized as a separate dominion. The poet Spenser in 1590 dedicates his poem "The Faerie Queen," to Elizabeth, Queen of England, France, Ireland and Virginia. When James VI. came to the throne Scotland was added to the list and Virginia was called the Fifth Kingdom.

I. J., East Norwalk, Conn. Please explain the meaning of the quotation from Ps. 2: 12: "Kiss the Son, lest he be angry."

Kissing or adoration—which was expressed with the mouth and hand in token of homage—has always been in the East the mark of subjection and reverenee. Samuel, after anointing Saul as king, kissed him. The same form was also used in religious worship. (See Job 31: 27.) The reference to the "Son" here and elsewhere in the Psalms is to Christ, the Only Begotten, whose dominion is the whole earth and who is to judge the nations. "The way" has a parallel reference in Ps. 1: 6, and shows that there is one "way" for the righteous and another for the ungodly.

C. Van H., Kalamazoo, Mich. 1. What is ptomaine poisoning? By what is it usually caused? 2. When Halley's comet again returns will it approach nearer the earth than in the present instance?

1. Ptomaines are alkaloids produced by the decomposition of animal substances. They are organic chemical poisons, and are found at times in most meats, especially forms of pork; fish and other seafood; cheese, butter and cream, and some other foods. 2. No one ean tell. The comet during its present trip varied its eourse somewhat from that expeeted by the astronomers.

Mrs. M. F. M., Blaekstone, Mass. Account for the sunny skies of Italy.

Poets and travelers usually refer to the skies of Italy as they appear in the summer time, and the Italian summer is practically rainless, with but few clouds in the sky, giving always the impression of a wide blue sunlit expanse above. The temperature is 70 to 80 degrees in summer and 35 to 50 in winter. A comparatively warm climate, with mild south winds now and then interspersed with the hot, dry siroceo from the South. Consequently the sun seems shining most of the time with a feeling of warmth throughout the land.

Mrs. F. G. S., Wallkill, N. Y. 1. By whom and for what purpose was paper first used? 2. What caused the Bread Riot in New York in 1837? 3. Where did Patrick Henry make his famous speech and what was the subject of it? 4. What is the State militia? 5. Give three important uses of the Hudson River. 6. What is meant by "libel" in law? 7. Who discovered the X-rays, and for what purpose are they used?

1. The art of paper-making was probably known to the Chinese and Japanese in very early times. About the twelfth eentury it was introduced into Spain by the Moors. Thenee it spread to Italy, France and Germany. It has evidently been used always for the same purposes as now. 2. The Bread Riot occurred in February, 1837, when, incensed by the high price of provisions, a mob attacked the flour-stores of New York City and commenced to remove or destroy their contents. They were soon subdued by the military. 3. Patrick Henry's greatest speech was made at Jamestown, Va., before Virginia's second revolutionary congress, and was a plea for the immediate arming of the Virginia militia. 4. The State militia really consists of every able-bodied male citizen between the ages of 18 and 45. It is divided into the organized militia, known as the "National Guards" of the several States; and the unorganized, known as "the reserve militia." The organization, armament and discipline of the organized militia is now the same as that of the regular army. 5. The Hudson River is used as a means of transportation; to supply drinking water; and to furnish power for manufacturing. It is also used for ice-making; and often, to our shame be it said, as a sewer. 6. A libel is written defamation made public, the effect of which is to impair the reputation of a person for honesty, decency and virtue; or to injure him in his business occupation or public office; or to bring upon him public contempt, ridicule or hatred, or cause him to be shunned or avoided. By the common law, the truth of the matter published is a complete defense. 7. The X-rays were discovered by Roentgen in 1895, and are therefore often called Roentgen-rays. They are used chiefly in surgery to detect the character of fractures, or the presence of foreign bodies in the human structure. The anatomy of the hand, or any other part of the human body, when interposed between an X-ray bulb and a phosphorescent screen, can be clearly seen; or any metal; as the flesh casts but a feeble shadow, while hard substances cast a much stronger one. The X-rays are also applied to some forms of skin and other diseases.

R. G. D., Lovettsville, Va. Explain Matt. 5: 40 and 41.

The Saviour in this passage was counseling his followers to live at peace with all men, and rather to suffer loss than indulge in quarrels and litigation which would simply breed hatred and heart-hurnings. The reference to the cloak may be explained by the fact that, in the East, it was not lawful to retain the cloak over night as a pledge from the poor, to whom it served as a hed-covering. The second passage means that we should not stint our generosity, but rather give and do more largely than is asked of us; in fact, rather submit to unreasonable demands than raise a quarrel. Generosity and kindness are set in high place among the practical Christian virtues.

Reader, Dawn, Mo. 1. Who wrote the Epistle of James? 2. Also Genesis and Revelation?

1. There were several of this name and the authorship is not at all certain. The leading commentators believe James, the Lord's "brother," one of the twelve, and to whom Paul refers in Gal. 2: 9, wrote the Epistle. He is said to have occupied a position of authority—probably superintendent—in the church at Jerusalem. 2. Genesis is one of the five books of Moses—the Pentateuch. The authorship of Revelation is disputed, but the best scholars hold that the book was written by John the Apostle in his old age, either when dwelling in Ephesus or during the Patmos exile.

R. H. W., Simpsonville, S. C. 1. In Ephesians 4: 5 are these words: One Lord, one faith, one baptism. What is meant by one baptism? 2. In view of the injurious effects of tobacco on the human system, the dreadful results that follow the use of cigarettes, and the enormous amount, $940,000,000, spent for tobacco in the United States annually, do you think a day school teacher, a Sunday School teacher, a minister, or any Christian, should use tobacco?

1. In this chapter, Paul was advocating unity among the brethren and explaining how, though they may vary in gifts and graces, all are necessary to a perfect whole, and to complete service. Baptism is the one and only visible sacrament by which we are once for all united to one Lord and incorporated into the "one body." Thus, its single celebration and individual significance symbolize unity. The passage has nothing to do with the form of baptism. 2. The use of tobacco is a vice. It is injurious to the human system and defaces God's temple. For the sake of example to others, it is well for professing Christians to abstain from it. The cigarette evil is the same vice intensified, since it is chiefly injurious to youth.

Mrs. A. McC., Birnamwood, Wis. Is it our duty to attend church, as Christians, where the pastor does not preach the Gospel and where he favors card-playing and other worldly amusements?

It is an easy matter to critieise a pastor on a single sermon. It is frequently done, to the detriment of the church and its work. If, however, a pastor does not preach the Gospel, and neglects it, week after week, he is not fulfilling the mission for which he was appointed. It then becomes a question for the whole body of that particular church to decide what shall be done. It has the right to decide in such cases. While certain rational amusements are desirable, we do not consider that card-playing and some other amusements—dancing included—come within that eategory. It is a safe rule to abstain from all doubtful amusements, for the sake of example, if for no other reason. We should avoid even the "appearance of evil." Card-playing and daneing never helped any one and have proved the way to ruin to thousands.

E. C., New Bedford. Are the Laskars mentioned in some mission articles from India members of a certain tribe or a social class?

Lascar meant a camp follower and sometimes a soldier. The term comes from the Hindostani and the Persian Laskari. It is now applied to the East Indian sailors who serve on European ships.

S. F., Lake Geneva, Wis. Was the Apostle Peter ever in Rome? If he was, at what time? Was it before or after the Apostle Paul was there?

There has been considerable controversy regarding Peter's experience in Rome. The general conclusion among scholars is that he did not go there before the last year of his life. Eusebius gives A.D. 42 as the probable date. Some authorities hold that Peter lived in Rome twenty or twenty-five years, and one writer (Windischmann) holds that Peter went to Rome immediately after his deliverance from prison (Acts 12) and stayed there until the Claudian persecution, five or six years later. He is believed to have died a martyr's death in Rome during the Neronian persecution, but the date is uncertain. There is nothing to substantiate claim that he was there simultaneously w Paul, nor is there any historical or Scriptu basis for assuming that he was the "f bishop of Rome."

T. H. K., Deer Island, Me. What is the hei of the Jungfrau in the Alps?

It is 13,669 feet and ranks third among Bernese Oberland peaks.

I. H., New York. 1. When and where was Bible first translated into the English l guage? 2. Did Martin Luther translate Bible into the German language?

1. The oldest version of the Scriptures is Septuagint, a Greek translation of A.D. 2 The first English translation—a partial on was that of Adhelm, about the year 706. first complete edition in Anglo-Saxon was sued ahout 1290, and Wycliffe's New Testam version appeared in 1378. 2. Luther's tran tions began in 1517 and continued at inter until 1532. He was assisted by Melanchtl and other competent persons, and his B was very highly thought of. He took as basis the early texts and subsequent tran tions, being guided by all the available schol ship at his command.

Missionary Items*

VE are entering upon the most glorious missionary epoch in the rld's history. The great object of te Laymen's Missionary Movement d the Student Volunteer Movement, te conversion of the entire world, y not be attained in two centuries, te brief time which has been set for i but it will surely come.

t is, perhaps, characteristic of our ople to underrate the culture of some o the old countries to which we are s ding missionaries. Thus China was a great, civilized, organized nation ven our ancestors were still rude sav- s, living in caves and subsisting on b ries and roots. Mrs. Stephen H. Edwin of Brooklyn, N. Y., has re- tly translated a wonderful Chinese b k on the proper conduct and eti- q tte of women. It was written ei hteen hundred years ago by a le ned Chinese lady.

t is a notable fact that in the W rld's Commercial Directory, which g es the ratings of the nations, China r ks first for integrity and honesty in b siness dealings.

ou would think, perhaps, that our ov idolized nation ought to hold first pl e in such a list. But, no—it is not ev n second or third. Holland comes se nd, England third and the United St es fourth.

e must remember also that it was th leading exemplar of the so-called m dern civilization, England itself, wh h introduced opium into China—on of the most awful crimes ever com- mi ed; and it was creditable to the w derful old empress, who has been on a few years in her grave, that she ga the order forbidding the further us of opium in her country, allowing te years for its elimination.

accordance with this edict, many gr t poppy fields have already been la waste and prepared for useful cr s.

Is also most creditable to this great na n that in many cases of the de- pa ure of young married Chinese me to secure a university education ab d, their wives have resorted to mi sionary boarding-schools at home, in rder that they might stand on so thing like an equal educational fo ng with their husbands upon their re n.

Ce of the most remarkable among he oung Chinese women is Dr. Mary Sh or Stone, as she is oftener called. She lives in Kiu-kiang, a city of 80,000 pe le in Central China. Her mother wa s one of the earliest in her province to iscountenance foot-binding and Dr. Mary herself was the first prac- ica illustration of her mother's he ry.

S graduated from a missionary sch l at home and then studied medi- ine at the University of Michigan. Her family is one of the proudest in Chi , and when she returned to her ati country she was given such a rec ion as is usually accorded only to a victorious general.

"Her fame as a skilled surgeon," ys Mrs. Baldwin, "has penetrated to ear every corner in China, and she is in charge of a large hospital, given by J. Danforth, a physician of Chi- ago as a memorial to his wife. She is only thirty-three years of age and has a splendid future. Besides reliev- ing her sisters of sickness, she is teach- ing them sanitation and how to care for their children and make their hom comfortable."

No longer are the child-widows of ndia stacked up like logs and burned. They are not yet treated properly, but many agencies are at work to help them.

Read of the wonderful work in Persia, in Korea, in Turkey. It is all most inspiring.

The Life Hereafter*

SPECULATIONS concerning the occupations of the saved have employed the minds of men ever since the cup of salvation was held out to us from the cross of Jesus.

That we should live forever in idleness, walking about the heavenly gardens, plucking the asphodels and admiring the streets of gold and the sea of glass, is no longer the theory of theologians. It is understood that the beautiful pictures of the palm-crowned victors over earthly sin, striking their harps forever and singing praises, are but poetic allegories, which stand, as Bunyan's great allegory stands, for deep and wonderful truths which mortals cannot comprehend.

"We do not know just what the heavenly life is," says Dr. J. R. Miller, "but we do know that it is loving, unselfish, holy, without sin. It is joyous, contented. Nobody in heaven ever worries. You will find it easy to fall into heavenly habits."

It sometimes seems as though God had sent to us of the modern world, this thought of a measureless eternity, in order that we might have a field for our dreams. We can dream of earthly delights, but they become so improbable as we pursue the briery way, that one by one we drop them.

Still, it must be that we, with our restless minds and our pressing activities, must now and again refresh ourselves with dreams. In contemplating the vastness of an eternal life, we have an adequate field in which our pent-up imaginations may properly disport themselves. It is not wholesome, perhaps, to dream too much in any line, but surely in picturing to ourselves the joys most desirable in eternity, we may, if anywhere, revel in innocent visions of the soul.

We are told that we shall be satisfied. It doth not appear how this will be accomplished; but if you love to draw and paint—if form and color appeal to you, may it not be that in the future life, your desire will be gratified?

Or you may love to work with little children, to tell them stories, to watch their kindling faces and listen to their naive comments. There you may have the pleasure indefinitely.

One beautiful, loving woman to whom children had been denied in this life, said that in heaven she looked forward to having children of her own—to care for and develop from day to day.

If you love music, literature, science, may it not be that in the Great Unknown you will have a liberty of utterance, of research, of accomplishment far beyond any that earth can afford?

In any case, we must believe that God will provide some form of congenial work for every one of us. In the far corners of his universe, there must be endless labors awaiting willing hands—tears to wipe away, darkened minds to enlighten, drooping hands to lift up.

A MOTHER'S PRAYER

UP to me sweet childhood looketh,
Heart and mind and soul awake;
Teach me of thy ways, O Father,
For sweet childhood's sake.

In their young hearts soft and tender,
Guide my hand good seed to sow,
That its blossoming may praise thee,
Wheresoe'er they go.

Give to me a cheerful spirit,
That my little flock may see,
It is good and pleasant service,
To be taught of thee.

Father, order all my footsteps;
So direct my daily way,
That in following me, the children
May not go astray.

Sanatogen
THE FOOD-TONIC

Sir Gilbert Parker,
the popular Canadian novelist:
"I have used Sanatogen at intervals since last autumn with extraordinary benefit. It is to my mind a true food tonic, feeding the nerves, increasing the energy and giving fresh vigor to the overworked body and mind."

Very Rev. William Theodotus Capers
Dean, Christ Church Cathedral, Lexington, Ky., says:
"I feel constrained to write you and say that Sanatogen has done everything for my wife. I have found this preparation restores a normal appetite and gives vitality to the nervous system."

Hall Caine
the dramatist, says:
"My experience of Sanatogen has been that as a tonic nerve food it has on more than one occasion benefited me."

Health is Equilibrium

NATURE tends to maintain balance. For all wear there is repair---for destruction there is construction --- for attack, defense—for strife, calm ---for consumption, re-creation.

The universal law is "for every action there is equal and contrary reaction." When you tear down you must rebuild---when you destroy you must replace. Often your energy is consumed faster than Nature can resupply. Tissues waste---nerves break down---life becomes continuous strife---pleasure wanes---duty drains.

Your nerves need revitalizing—your tissues re-building. You need a tonic—you need Sanatogen. Combining the two elements of physical cells and tissues—albumen and sodium glycero-phosphate, it builds up the body, gives strength for weakness, adjusts the strained nerves, promotes appetite and food assimilation, enriches the vitiated blood. It serves man and makes him master of his health. Thousands of testimonials praise it. All leading doctors prescribe it. You should use it.

PERKINS & CO. Lawrence, Kans

When a Man Borrows

WE have received a number of letters from subscribers asking for the address of some banking concern that would be willing to lend money upon real estate. Some of these have come from sparsely settled districts, and the real estate in question was overworked farms. Others were from small towns in which loans were desired on unimproved property. The residents seemed to feel that there must exist somewhere institutions with much surplus cash on hand for the purpose of taking up whatever offers were made to them. In very few cases were the essentials of desirability, from the standpoint of the bank, mentioned, the resident in each case seeming to feel that his statement of the value of the property in question would go unchallenged.

As a matter of fact the process of procuring a loan is more or less intricate. Banking houses which make a habit of lending money on property generally have individual rules which are very seldom broken. Opportunities to lend money are far more numerous than opportunities to secure loans and consequently banking houses are able to outline their own rules of procedure. Very few of the larger institutions in New York, for instance, care to lend money upon property outside of the metropolitan district. They make a specialty of this district, are thoroughly acquainted with all its financial probabilities and, operating within this prescribed territory, they are saved the expense of sending long distances on what might after all prove to be fruitless investigation.

Where to Obtain Loans

When we have been asked by subscribers where to obtain loans on property, we have almost invariably advised the subscriber to go to a local bank. In nine cases out of ten, the local bank will be found to be well acquainted with the values of the various properties within their own territory and if such local banks do not feel safe in lending money upon real estate in their vicinity, it would probably be a hard matter to obtain a loan from a bank at a distance, since the latter bank would be very likely to seek information concerning the property in question from the bank located nearest to the property. In cases where there is no bank in the small town where the property has been located, we have advised the intending borrower to apply to the bank in the nearest town.

In attempting to borrow money upon property or upon a business, it is always well for the intending borrower to tell a plain, straightforward story of the values of his property, his business assets and liabilities, etc., etc. Any concealment of the true state of affairs is almost sure in the end to work to the detriment of the intending borrower; because banks have a way of learning even the most intimate financial secrets which might possibly have a bearing upon the financial standing of their clients, and most of the banks nowadays co-operate with one another in exchanging such information concerning customers. Most of the banks operate a card system which soon becomes a private library of information concerning the people with whom they do business, even as far as their personal and business habits are concerned, their mode of living, manner of saving, extravagances, whether of the head of the family or of the family itself.

The Telltale Card System

Such information is not open to the public, but it is on file for the benefit of the bank's credit man or the credit men of other banks who may apply for the information. Men who have been rated as wealthy by a community at large have been amazed and chagrined to find credit refused them for reasons which were at the time a mystery, but which could be laid to their mode of life as it was written down from time to time on the card system. Many a hard-working business man has been surprised to find himself refused credit by his local bank, and might have been indignant had he known that it was due less to a specific fault of his own than to the well known extravagance of his wife.

Liabilities of Conduct

Bankers are students of human nature. With them two and two make exactly four. In deciding whether or not a customer shall be trusted for a loan, they base their answer, not so much on his personal honesty or his willingness to pay, as upon the various causes, personal or otherwise, which may interfere with his ability to do so.

A man may have a flourishing business and all may be going well, and then after continued prosperity he may adopt habits of living which in the end may interfere with the accumulation of assets. The banker feels that one bit of extravagance begets another, and sets down upon the card system the facts as they come to him one by one. In the course of time the man applies for a loan and as security he offers what he considers to be his assets and against these he mentions a number of liabilities which seem to him to be so little worthy of consideration that the banker cannot help but consider the loan a good one. But the man fails to mention those other liabilities arising out of his over-expensive habits which the banker has set down against his credit in the card system. And so he may be surprised to meet with a refusal of his proposition.

And our readers would probably be amazed to learn how very tangible bankers consider these liabilities of conduct. Their theory is that no man in business can wander too far from the straight and narrow road without producing some effect upon his general integrity.

What applies to the man of commercial business, applies equally as well to the agriculturist, to the small householder, or anyone else who may wish to borrow upon property. Do not depend too much upon the mere commercial value of your securities. There are men in this world who could borrow more money upon their personal integrity than others could upon a large amount of tangible assets.

Do Not Overborrow

You may be sure, however, that the banker will examine very intimately into the tangible assets which you have to offer as security for a loan, but in offering them be sure to go to the logical source of money supply, that is, to the one who will be most likely to lend because he is most thoroughly acquainted with your property. If you own a farm in Montana, it would be illogical to ask a New York banker to lend you money upon it, when the New York banker has more applications for loans upon New York City real estate than he could possibly arrange. Yet the farm might be very good security for the money, and the local banker might be very willing to take it as security for a loan.

Again, do not expect to borrow more than a limited percentage of the value of the property. In lending money bankers always assume that they may be forced to foreclose the mortgage and dispose of the property. Forced sales seldom bring a price anywhere near the value of the property placed under the hammer. And so bankers are prone to leave a very large margin of safety for their own protection when making a loan.

How We Should Forgive*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

OW to forgive freely, fully and forever is a lesson we all need to learn. Although Peter had en walking with Jesus for nearly if t quite two years, he had not learned there was to be known about forving others; and so he asked Jesus e question:

"How oft shall I forgive him?" ter's impetuous nature no doubt cen brought him into strained relans where forgiveness had to be exered; and if the truth were known, it s usually Peter who had need to be given.

"Until seven times?" Undoubtedly friction brought about by Peter's petuosity sometimes called forth sty words and actions on the part others, and he had then something forgive. When Peter asked Jesus w many times one might be expected forgive another, he seemed to think t "seven times one" was the limit. "Until seventy times seven." This s the reply of Jesus.

Peter's Measure of Forgiveness

How small was Peter's measure of giveness compared with that of sus! It was as an anthill is to a ntain! But really Peter's measu was not small compared with the y people generally forgive others. Cite often we hear some one say rhaps ourselves): "I have forgiven once, and I'll not do it again." en worse than this, we have somees heard some people say: "I can er forgive him." Let us begin with er's measure and then progress ang the scale set by Jesus. We will e up eight with Jesus, when we e finished seven with Peter. Let see how it will work. A gentleman ing in the evening in a window overking his beautiful lawn and flower den, saw a boy crossing it, ruthly breaking a branch here and re, and picking flowers only to w them down. The gentleman t quickly down to the lawn, and ost before the boy saw him comhe had his hand on the boy's ulder, not in an angry clutch, but firm kindness, and he said: "Tell my boy, which do you think is the t flower in the garden?" The boy ked as if he would like to escape, he felt that would be impossible, e looked around and spied a beautl moss rosebud, and pointing to it, answered: "That is best." With his d still on the boy's shoulder, the tleman reached down and picked it, gave it to the boy. The boy looked the gentleman's face and asked: n't you going to have me punished, ?" "No," was the reply, "I am giv you the best flower in my garden. will never come and trample down flower beds again, will you?" ver, sir, as long as I live," was the hatic reply; "but, please sir, ain't e some little errand I could do for ?" Many a time after that boy was , cap in hand, standing at the gentan's gate with the loving petition his lips: "Please, sir, isn't there e little errand I could do for you?"

The Debt of a Thousand Talents

fter Jesus had shown to Peter the e measure for forgiveness, he e a parable that he might cause er to understand more fully the meaning of forgiveness. Jesus e of a king who had the accounts servants (rather, officers) brought re him. It was found that one d him one thousand talents, equal enty millions of dollars, or ten ions if reckoned by the Greek dard. According to the law the g ordered that the man and his family should be sold as slaves that the debt might be paid. When told what must be done, the debtor fell on his knees before the king and begged for mercy, promising that if he would have patience, he would pay the whole debt. And so the king not only graciously released him, but forgave him the debt.

What did the happy man then do? Why, he went out and took a man by the throat, who owed him only one hundred shillings (less than twenty dollars), and angrily demanded: "Pay what thou owest." And when he begged: "Have patience, and I will pay thee all"—"No," was the answer, "you shall go to prison, and there you shall stay until you have paid me all." We say: "What a monster!" And truly he was. But he soon got a lesson which showed him there was another side to forgiveness beside his own. The king being informed of his hardness, sent for him and asked him the question: "Shouldest not thou also have had mercy on thy fellow-servant, even as I had mercy on thee?" But the "monster" did not see it in that light, and so the king revoked his leniency, and sent him to prison until he should pay the whole debt of twenty millions of dollars. And Jesus closed his parable by saying: "So shall also my heavenly Father do unto you, if ye forgive not every one his brother from your hearts." On another occasion Jesus said: "If you forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you." (Matt. 6: 14.)

"Take care how you offend me, for I never forgive," said one man to another in the hearing of John Wesley. "Then," said the preacher, "I hope you never sin."

An Indian Adoption

"I can forgive anything but that." Have you ever heard any one say so? After you have read the following incident, you may think there is nothing too hard to forgive. James Evans was a missionary to the Indians. While out shooting in a canoe with a Christian Indian by the name of Hassel, belonging to the Chippewayan tribe, his gun accidentally went off, killing the Indian. He started out at once to acquaint the relatives with what had happened. He fully expected that he would be killed by them, because "a life for a life" was the tribal law. When he reached the encampment, he asked for Hassel's father, and on entering his wigwam he told the sad news. His recital was received with angry shouts by the relatives of the dead Indian, and they were flourishing their tomahawks when the mother sprang forward, and placing her hands on the white man's head exclaimed: "He shall not die. He loved my son. He shall live, and be my son in the place of the one who is not among the living." Instantly weapons were dropped; angry passions subsided, and after the custom of the Indians, James Evans was adopted into the family of the tribe. He remained some time with them, and when at length he was permitted to return to his family and resume his work, he made it a rule regularly to send some portion of his income to the Indian wigwam in continuance of the custom of the departed son. You say, if James Evans had intentionally killed the young Indian it would have been quite another matter. If that had been the case, we think there might have been a different result; but the instructive point in the story is that the people concerned were willing to listen to extenuating circumstances. Usually time is not taken for such a process and revengeful action is had at once, or the memory of an injury is allowed "to become organized," as physicians say of a clot of blood on the brain. Beware when a grievance becomes organized in a human mind; it is then what we call a "grudge," and its removal becomes almost impossible. In place of a grudge have a grave, such a grave as Pastor Charles Wagner describes: "In the very depths of yourself dig a grave. Let it be like some forgotten spot to which no path leads; and there, in the eternal silence, bury the wrongs you have suffered. Your heart will feel as if a weight had fallen from it."

"John the Unafraid"

"John the Unafraid" is the title of a remarkable little book we have recently been reading that certainly throws some new light on the subject of forgiveness. We quote from it: "And on the next day, the judges and rulers of the courts, having heard of the man who was both faithful and unafraid, came to his home, and sought speech with him. And John came out unto them, saying: 'Why are ye not about your Master's business? Are ye not paid to adjust righteously the differences between your fellows?' And one of the judges said: 'We have little to do. Those who come to us insist that they are in the wrong, the debtor demanding the right to pay, and the plaintiff demanding the right to forgive.' Then John said: 'Learn the truth and give judgment in justice and according to the law. If your brothers come into your court enemies and depart friends, then you have wrought for righteousness and need not fear.'"

In this same little book we are led to look upon misdeeds as sicknesses rather than as evil deeds. One of the judges said to John: "What shall we do with these two score men crowded into our jail?" "Alas," said John, "are so many of our brothers sick?" "Not sick," answered the judge, "but wicked lawbreakers, guilty of great sin against God and man." And John answered: "There is no sin save unkindness." "How say you?" said the judge; "is the robber only unkind?" And John said: "Surely he is unkind to the one he robbed, and unkind to the mother who gave him birth. This unkindness is a sickness that may be cured if we set about the Master's work." It will certainly help us to forgive others if we think of them as "sick" rather than "mean." We believe that God looks at us that way, or it never could have been written of him: "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." (John 3: 16.)

The Story of the Palimpsest

We may learn from the story of the palimpsest something about how God forgives us. A palimpsest is a parchment which has been written on twice. This is made possible by having the first writing sponged out by the use of chemicals and something else written on the cleansed surface. The reason for using the parchment the second time was the value of parchment in days long ago. The Rev. H. Dudley Lampden says of the palimpsest: "In days of old a pious man would take some parchment covered with ribald songs and sponge it clean. On the cleansed surface he would write the gospel of God's grace. This may be done with you and me. God's good Spirit can cleanse us and write upon our hearts God's truth. It is a fact that by the use of chemicals the first writing may be restored. But let us never forget it: "There is a chemistry which can remove all the stain of sin so that it shall be remembered no more against us. That is the precious blood of Christ. It alone can blot out the past. It alone can wash away the foul and foolish, the silly, wicked, and sinful things. It can so remove 'the handwriting that was against us' that it never can reappear to condemn us." Let us try to forgive those who sin against us after the same manner that God forgives those who sin against him. We have so little to forgive in comparison with him. But we will not be able to do it unless we do it as his followers.

As the winter days passed, Robert Hargrave spent the most of his time at the bank, giving Nell ample chance to make her arrangements. Not until the day of the reception did she broach the subject.

"I suppose I might as well tell you," she began as her husband was about to leave the breakfast-table, "the reception which you forbade will be held to-day. I had decided to give it up, but when Alma Chapman told me that people all over town were saying that you were 'mean' to me, and that Agnes, your old sweetheart, was reporting that you treated me 'like a dog,' I decided, for once, to do as I pleased. Ever since we have been married I have denied myself all unnecessary things. I have never deceived you about anything before, but I find that the more I scrimp the more I am expected to. I concluded it didn't pay. When I asked you for money, you refused, so—" Nell rose and opened the parlor door, where the decorator was already at work— "I went to the stationer's and the jeweler's and bought everything I needed and ordered the bills sent to you. You needn't look so dumbfounded. It's only a week now until your promotion. The dealers will wait for the money."

Rob Hargrave's face paled, then turned a ghastly green, but he said never a word. The clock ticked loudly in the awful silence. His nervous hands gripped the sides of the chair. No words came from between his pale lips. He seemed but the ghost of the gay young fellow whom she had married but a few short months before. At last he rose and tottered from the house.

The storm which Nell Hargrave had expected had not come; but she felt vaguely that something a thousand times more terrible might be the result of her disobedience. All was complete at noon, but the master of the house did not return.

It was Christmas Day. With a white, drawn face Nell Hargrave arrayed herself in her festal robes. With laugh and smile she met each guest, and without a break the programme with which she had expected to dazzle the society of Ripley went forward.

"It was a howling success," whispered Alma, squeezing her hostess' fingers, as she made ready for her departure. "I wonder what Agnes will say now."

In her agony, Nell Hargrave suddenly realized that what Agnes Quarles said, what the whole world said, was nothing to her. What she wanted most was her husband. Nell Hargrave sought the telephone.

"It is past banking hours. Bob has started home, I suspect," she told the girl, who rang the second and third time. "I will call again later."

Eight, nine, ten o'clock dragged slowly by. One and two struck and still Rob Hargrave was absent.

"I never dreamed he would act like this," moaned Nell, roaming about the empty rooms, which were still in confusion. "Some terrible accident has detained him."

A June-rose tint had crept into the winter sky above the tree-tops. Dressed in the bedraggled garments of yesterday, Nell Hargrave had waited until morning; and she waited on until noon and night, for the husband who did not come.

What cared she for the congratulations of her friends, which she received by every mail? What cared she that the Daily News devoted a whole column to a description of her reception, which was called "the most unique affair ever held in Ripley"?

In the afternoon of the third day, a familiar step sounded in the hall. When Nell met her husband, the strange, wild look in his eyes quieted all her eager questions. She did not think, now, of reproaches; she knew before he spoke that his mind was wandering. Immediately the heartbroken wife summoned a doctor.

"Some great disappointment or grief has brought on brain fever," said he. "He must have careful nursing. When his body becomes stronger his reason will return."

Through the long days of suffering, days when blissful unconsciousness made Robert Hargrave forget his sorrow, the wife learned much from his frenzied ravings. One spring morning he awakened with the light of reason in his eyes.

"I feel as tired as if I had been sick for a week," he smiled up at the anxious watcher beside the bed. "I must get to work at once. What day is this?"

"Thursday, the third of March."

"Then I have been here— Oh, I remember." With a sob Robert Hargrave buried his face in the snowy sheets and said no more.

Business matters were not mentioned again until the invalid was ready for a trip uptown.

"Todds have promised to give me a place in the grocery as soon as I am able to take it," he announced cheerily, as he returned. "I shall earn twelve dollars a week. I am thankful for even that."

"But you surely are not going to give up your place at the bank!" cried the wife in amazement. "What about your promotion? Have you inquired?"

Without a word, Hargrave handed her a crumpled, tear-stained letter. Wonderingly she unfolded it. It enclosed a newspaper clipping, which she recognized as an account of her unlucky reception.

"What connection is there between your position and this?" Nell held up the printed sheet. "What——"

"Only read!" commanded the husband.

"Dear Hargrave," the letter ran, "I had thought and hoped for some time that you would be our new cashier. No other man in the service is equal to you in a number of important things. Rumors floating about town have said that you were living beyond your means and that you were financially embarrassed, but I refused to believe them. Yesterday I picked up a paper containing the enclosed clipping. I read it. How could I uphold you longer? I was obliged to accept the other men's opinion for my own. There are many temptations in our business. We dare not place our money in the hands of a man who cannot manage his own business or even his little household. I do not think you dishonest, but we must take proper precautions.

"Believe me, I am your friend and well-wisher, ANDREW ELLIOT."

"And your bad luck, your sickness, your disappointment, is all my fault," began Nell in a voice of awful calmness. "When success was within your grasp, I wrecked the labor of years by my silly pride. O Rob, Rob, forgive me. You give up everything, have your very self crucified that I might wear a crown of "frills"! I do not suppose that I can ever undo the wrong I have done, but I am going to President Elliot right away and ask him to take you back."

"I will not allow you to humiliate yourself!" cried Robert Hargrave.

"Is it not better that I should humiliate myself for a moment, an hour, than that you should suffer a lifetime in atonement for my sin? Do not keep me. I am going."

The next morning, looking up from his papers, President Elliot saw before him a beautifully dressed young woman. She held a letter in her hand. Without introducing herself, she began to speak.

"My husband received this letter since then he has been unable to ans it in person. I and I alone am resp sible for the state of his affairs. M I explain myself?"

"You are Mrs. Hargrave?" hazar the president.

"I am," said Mrs. Robert Hargr soberly. "One year ago we w married. My husband has been all a husband should be, but I was y and young. I had lived a hard life had never known the luxury of wea fine clothes and going to parties. W I came to Ripley, I was unfortu enough to be invited to various so functions. I became popular. presence was demanded everywh My husband worked early and lat procure for me the pleasures I cra but I was not satisfied. I negle him," sobbed the girl, "and bec more careless all the time.

"When I spoke to him about the ception of which you heard, he forb me to give it. I was angry, but I tended to obey him until a girl-fr called. She twitted me because of 'stinginess,' as she called it, and m me so angry that on the spur of a ment I rushed out, ordered wha wanted, and had the bills held so he would not know anything about party, and in that way deceived hi

"He left the house when I expla it all to him a few hours before party. Under the influence of shock, half crazed, he wandered hours through the fields before he turned. An attack of brain fever lowed. Although it has been t months, he is on the street for the st time to-day.

"I am young, President Elliot, but the agony of the months that have gone, I have lived an age. Do not my husband suffer for what I ve done! Do not crucify him for my Do not shut him out from the b He loves its very walls! Recons the matter and give me good new to carry back to him."

"You plead your husband's c well, Mrs. Hargrave," said the p dent when she had finished. "The story you have told presents the just as I supposed it was. I acc your husband of this, but he ref to blame you. The place which tended for him has already gon another man, so, of course, your band's promotion is impossible think myself, that for a man who as been so faithful as he, dismissal is too severe a penalty. The only thing can do now is to allow him to take up his work where he left it off. In a years, a chance for rising may one again. I prepared a letter for yesterday stating about what I said to you. A WONDERFUL CLOCK

FOR many generations the wonderful clock in Strasburg Cathedral, known as "The Clock of the Three Ages," has been regarded as the world's most remarkable timepiece. It was made by Isaac Halrecht, a Jewish astrolger, in 1439. Now, however, the Strasburg clock has been completely eclipsed by the "master clock" in the Metropolitan building, New York City, which is unquestionably a most ingenious and surprising combination of mechanism and electricity. It is described by Joseph A. Baker in a recent issue of Popular Electricity in an interesting article. Its four giant dials can be read day or night at a long distance; it chimes the quarters, and announces them also by red and white beacon lights. The clock dials are 26 feet 6 inches in diameter, with numerals 4 feet high and minute-marks 10½ inches in diameter. The hands are 17 feet and 13 feet 7 inches long respectively, and weigh, together, 1,700 pounds. The four bronze bells have an aggregate weight of 13,500 pounds, and the flashing lantern has an aggregate candle-power of over 12,000. The clock system includes, besides the four tower dials, hundreds of other secondary clocks distributed throughout the offices and other rooms of the building. All of this mighty equipment is electrically actuated and controlled from a single "master clock," which is itself electrically self-winding, requiring no touch of human hands from one year's end to the other.

The Master Clock

This "master clock" is on the second floor, while the clock-room, behind the great dials of the tower clock, is on the twenty-sixth floor. Here is the automatic mechanism controlled by the "master clock," which operates all the other clocks in the building. Of the "master clock," Mr. Baker gives this concise bit of description:

"Suppose the time is a little before two. As we watch, the drum of the chimes transmitter begins to turn, and, one after another, all of the four contact fingers are kicked up into the air. The sound of the answering tower bells comes down to us but tardily, on account of the great distance, but it is a kind of music simply to watch the changing measures marked by the dancing bits of metal. Before we realize it, the motion ceases, and we turn our glance to the hour-strike mechanism. Its contact fingers close and open twice, in leisurely succession, followed by the booming notes from the 7,000-pound B-flat 'announcing-bell' from its place on the forty-fifth story."

Spread the News

A WISE advertising man was once asked why some people do not read advertisements, and his answer was laconic but full of truth: "Because they don't." Now, while this might seem at first glance to be merely flippant, there is much of truth in it. Many people do not read advertisements merely because they do not know how interesting the modern advertisement has become. If they knew, they would make a practice of reading the advertisements with as much care as they do the editorial columns.

You will often hear women, and men too for that matter, telling one another of the rare bargains to be obtained in a certain store, and such information is usually welcome. Now, the advertising man is doing this very thing on a larger scale. Ah, but, you may say, can the word of the advertising man be depended upon? It certainly can in the case of most leading publications in general, and of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in particular. In fact, the day has come when deceptive advertising does not pay. Advertising nowadays must have two leading qualities to succeed—attractiveness and truthfulness. If it have not attractiveness, people will not read it, and if it have not truthfulness, the ill result which is sure to follow will react upon the business of the advertiser.

Whenever any of our subscribers is defrauded by an advertiser in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD we will make good the claim, provided that the subscriber, who must be of record, has mentioned THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in writing to the advertiser, and provided the claim is made to us within two months of the date of the appearance of the advertisement.

GOOD HOT WEATHER ADVICE.

The Chicago Health Department Publishes Some Very Timely and Sensible Advice on Eating and Drinking in Hot Weather.

A leading Chicago newspaper publishes some very sane suggestions regarding eating and drinking during the hot Summer days. The first two paragraphs are worth reprinting. Here they are:

> In warm weather you can cut your food down one half and be the better for it. If you do not need it, why take it?
> Let the meat and greasy things alone and live on fruits, vegetables, salads, milk and the cereals.

The Board of Health adds other timely and sensible paragraphs regarding drinking, clothing and avoidance of sunstroke, all of which should be self-evident to the person of average intelligence. It is with the food suggestion that we are most directly concerned, for the maintenance of health, good spirits and high working efficiency are largely questions of proper diet.

The Health Department says to "cut out meat and greasy things and live on fruits, vegetables, salads, milk and the cereals." The best cereal to eat as a substitute for meat and other heavy foods is Shredded Wheat, not only because of its high nutritive value, but because it is made in biscuit form, which adapts it to so many delicious, wholesome combinations with berries and other fresh fruits which happen to be in the market.

A very delicious and nourishing meal can be quickly prepared by heating Shredded Wheat Biscuits in the oven until they are crisp, then covering each one with strawberries or other berries and serving with milk or cream and sugar. Such a meal is not only very satisfying, but very healthful and strengthening, supplying all the material which the human body needs without taxing digestive organs or clogging the liver.

A. S., Poultney, Vt. What is Michaelmas Day and why do they eat goose in England on that day?

Michaelmas, September 29, is the feast of St. Michael. It was instituted in 487. The custom of eating goose on this day has been said to arise from the fact that Queen Elizabeth heard of the destruction of the Spanish Armada while eating the bird at the house of Sir Nevelle Umfreyville, September 29, 1588. The custom, however, seems much older in other parts of Europe.

M. T. McK., Harrisburg, Pa. Are schools for the care of neglected children a philanthropic innovation of recent date?

Infant schools distinct from foundling or orphan asylums were founded in the eighteenth century in France and Scotland. In the former at Waldbach in Alsace, now part of Germany, in the latter at New Lanark, Scotland. Switzerland and Germany developed the idea.

L. F. Todd, Richmond, Va. Your editorial on "The Deadly House-fly" suggests that I send you a clipping which describes a very simple way of getting entirely rid of the fly. I have tried this plan for two years and find that it gives the greatest satisfaction: Flies will gather on the windows at certain times of the day, especially in the early morning, when the sun is shining on the window, or if the room is darkened a little. When flies gather on windows in this way they always crawl as near to the top as they can go. If there is a little opening left, they will go out. By placing the screen under the outside sash and pulling the inside sash down about one inch below the top of the screen, it will leave a small opening, and the flies will go out, but will not come back. The shade should be pulled down even with the bottom of the inside sash. The ordinary adjustable screen is all that is needed. If the screens are placed as above described, the house will be entirely free of flies.

A. S. A., Woonsocket, R. I. Your reply to an inquiry as to the authenticity of the Gospels is most excellent; also just the right length to attract instead of repelling by length. It is always good to impress people with the fact that we have authentic data for proofs of Holy Writ. Will you please give your readers some of the grounds for our faith in the reliability or authenticity of the Acts?

The Book of Acts is one of the New Testament books that are accepted as historical. It is generally believed to have been written by Luke, who accompanied Paul to Rome (Acts 28) and was with him there (Col. 4: 14 and Phil. 24). Both books are similar in style. Acts shows by internal evidence that the writer was with Paul up to the point where he reached Philippi (Acts 16: 11) and that after Paul's absence of two years, Luke rejoined him at that place. There is still another basis for the claim of Luke's authorship. His Gospel was the Life of the Saviour, and his Acts was written to show the life and labors of Jesus' Apostles in the establishment of his kingdom. It is largely a personal narrative. The period covered is, approximately, from A.D. 29 to A.D. 60.

C. P. B., Janelew, W. Va. Please explain Matt. 4: 1 to 11. Could Jesus Christ have sinned?

The best scholarship has found it a hard task to deal with this subject. All concede that although Jesus, being in the form and subject to all the conditions of humanity, was tempted in all things as we are, he was without sin. This crowning temptation arose, not from the sinless mind of the Son of God, but from the great enemy of mankind. All the temptations mentioned in the chapter were external to Christ, but the conflict was an internal one. First, he was urged to distrust God's providential care; next he was tempted to a presumptuous act by which he might demonstrate his own divine superiority to the laws God has established in nature, and lastly he was tempted to indulge a world-wide ambition—the greatest lure that could be held out to a human being. But Jesus, putting it aside, made use of it as the basis of a mighty lesson, to show that no man could ultimately profit by serving Satan (See Mark 8: 36). The whole record of the temptation is interpreted to show the human race that if they are under God's care, trusting in him, armed with "the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word," the tempter will assault them in vain, for they will find their armor complete and equal to all emergencies, not to encourage but to resist temptation. Like their Master, they can say, "The prince of this world hath nothing in me."

J. V. H., Lake Placid, N. Y. What is meant by the Helderberg Group in geology?

The Helderberg Group is a series of limestone rocks found from New York to Tennessee. The rock beds are from 300 to 600 feet thick in New Jersey and New York, but smaller further south.

L. C., Towanda, Pa. What invention and what motive led Columbus to discover America?

Columbus did not know that America existed. He believed that the world was round and that by sailing westward he would reach India by a more direct route than the one in use around the lower end of Africa. When he reached the outlying islands of the American continent he and his fellow explorers supposed from their tropical appearance that he had reached India, and our Indians received their name through this mistake. The motive was a new trade route to the East. There was no new invention in the case.

N. G. B., Long Island City, N. Y. What is the State motto of Nebraska, as it appears on the State seal?

"Equality Before the Law."

R. S. A., Windsor, Vt. I read that President ———, of ———, not only tells his own students but has sent the message out to all the students of this land, that the modern world, at least the intelligent and thoughtful portion, has outgrown the old idea that God sent his Son to earth, announcing his advent by signs and wonders, or that his Son was authorized to forgive sinners who conformed to the terms revealed; or that Jesus transmitted this miraculously tested power to his apostles, etc. What do you think of that statement?

It is on a par with other wild assertions by the "new theology" promoters, who advocate a Christless Christianity and would do away with the Bible altogether, if they could. Simple denial is not evidence. The authority and authenticity of Scripture are established and skeptical attacks cannot harm them. Tom Paine and Ingersoll made equally wild assertions long ago, but their influence to-day is forgotten. This professor's talk is merely the echo of these old infidelities.

J. D. G., Gardiner, Me. 1. Why should any religion have a hell in it? 2. Why do people object to joining a church that has no hell in its creed?

1. However we may interpret hell—whether as a place of torment, or simply as a condition of permanent separation from the blessed, as the result of a sinful life in this world, it is inseparable from the thought of a future life where divine justice will assign to each his proper place. The doctrine of Christ and his apostles teaches this, and we are also assured that "the servant who knows his lord's will and does it not, deserves to be beaten with many stripes" and that "of him to whom much is given, much will be required." Where conditions are irrevocably fixed, there can be no community of interests between the good and the evil. A religion which does not recognize the element of divine justice as well as love and mercy is inconceivable. 2. Because they recognize it as illogical. As the world advances on spiritual lines, it becomes more assured of the fact that divine justice will do its perfect work hereafter. That a persistent life of sin without repentance should bring its own punishment, is strictly in accord not only with the Scriptures, but with the conclusions of the human mind, which recognizes that this life is a school of training and service, in which we are free to choose the right or the wrong, to make the best or the worst of our talents and opportunities, and to suffer the consequences of our own acts.

L. G. P., Bateshury, S. C. 1. At what age is man said to be living on "borrowed time"? 2 Please explain Matt. 5: 23, 24.

1. After seventy, which is the full completion of the allotted span, he is said to "borrow" the years. 2. It means that we ourselves ought to forgive others, before we ask forgiveness of God. We should dismiss from our hearts all enmities and ill-feeling; "make it up" with those with whom we have a quarrel, right a wrong if one exists, and become reconciled to our neighbors or relatives with whom we have a difference. It was a beautiful custom of the early Christian Church to have a general r onciliation on the part of those who purpos sitting down at the communion tabl

Mrs. M. E. C., Goodwater, Ala. 1. Do y think there will be degrees in heaven, a if so, to what extent? 2. Do you think t third chapter of I. Cor. (I. Cor. 3) teac there will be degrees in heaven?

1. Scripture teaching and our best conc tions of divine justice lead to the conclusi that, while all the redeemed will be equally sured of God's love and care in the life to cor there will be distinctions. The martyr w gave his life for the truth, those who made t greatest sacrifices for others, and those w brought many into the kingdom, will have ma stars in their crown. See Dan. 12: 3, I. C 15: 41, 49, and other passages.

C. E. K., Elmore, Minn. 1. Is there any mo ment erected in honor of Aaron Burr the United States? 2. Did Aaron Burr h any children? If so, how many and w were their names?

1. No; there is no monument in Aa Burr's honor. 2. He had a daughter, Th dosia Burr, who was captured by pirates a put to death.

W. S., Goldwin, Que. Will you ki tell me through the columns your paper if the gipsies traveli in this country are really Eg tians from Egypt, or what co try are they from?

The problem of the origin of gipsies is still unsolved. It wo seem from linguistic evidence, h ever, that they are remotely descen from low-caste Hindus of Northwe ern India. The name gipsy is a c ruption of Egyptian. They were s posed to have come in the Middle A from Egypt or rather "Little Egyp In their own language they ca themselves Romany, and Rom at time was equivalent to the Byzant Empire, which included Greece, Epirus is said to be little Egypt. Greece gipsies were numerous bef the fifteenth century and certain c tles were called gipsy castles and tradition is they were driven out the Turks. There is evidence to sh that they came into Epirus fr Persia, to which country they had b brought from India in the fifth c tury. In 855 27,000 were captured the Byzantines and brought i Greece. Such seems the proba story of their descent.

Brookins in His Wright Machine Flying Over the Surf

ATLANTIC CITY had its nerves thrilled on July 9, when Walter Brookins soared aloft to a height exceeding 6,000 feet, breaking all previous records for aeroplane flights toward the blue. It took nearly an hour for Brookins to go up, his rising sweeps being two miles in diameter. Each sweep carried him higher. At last, feeling that his engine would stop, he crossed the line arranged by the worker below. His barograph registered 6,000 feet. He came down in seven minutes, his machine making short circles which took the watchers' breath away. At times it canted at a dangerous angle. The same week the aeronautical world was saddened by the news of the death of Captain Rolls in England, the young man who some time ago crossed the British Channel and returned without a stop. He was killed by his machine falling at Bournemouth. Five Germans were killed in Germany by a fall from a "passenger machine" during the same week.

A PRINCE OF INDIA VISITS US

MANY princes and foreign statesmen have found America a pleasant place in which to spend a holiday, and their coming now excites little more than passing remark. It is seldom, however, that a ruler who holds in his hands the destinies of millions of people makes a tour of the "States," so that His Highness, the Gaekwar of Baroda, on his journey across the continent from Vancouver to New York, has been the recipient of much attention, and his views on conditions in the East and the countries he has visited have been given wide publicity. His highness now feels quite well acquainted with America and its ways, for this is his third trip and he has declared his intention of coming back again in two years to see what progress we are making in industrial education, the subject in which he is most interested, and to see if there is anything more in Western life which might be of benefit to the people in his Indian principality.

With visions of Oriental splendor in his mind, derived from numerous pictures of the glittering ceremony of the Durbar, and from the writers who have written of India with such enthusiasm that it seems a place where the colors of the rainbow have been brought to earth in the white-walled temples and amber castles, a member of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD staff went up the Hudson to meet the Gaekwar, who was on his way to New York on board the steamer Hendrick Hudson. Once on the steamer it began to be evident that the Gaekwar was not such a ruler as appear in the story books of the East. Having been the most picturesque parts of the "American Rhine" he was busily engaged in making a study of one of America's greatest river steamers. One attendant thought His Highness was in the engine room, while another was sure that he was last seen making his way to the pilot house. After a long search a short swarthy man with a most businesslike air, dressed in a light gray suit and wearing a natty alpine hat, appeared from the upper regions of the Hendrick Hudson. He was accompanied by Mr. E. E. Olcutt, president of the Hudson River Day line, who had gone up to West Point to meet the Gaekwar, and there was no doubt that the man in the gray suit with his straight black hair and quick intelligent eyes was the ruler of Baroda. Following came Dr. William J. Chamberlain, secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Reformed Church in India, and Rev. Mr. Van Ess, of Arabia, who had joined the Gaekwar at Albany. The personal aids and attendants were at different points of vantage about the boat, all interested in the passing people and the passing shores, but oblivious to the attention they themselves attracted.

Although he had been interviewed every day since he landed on our shores his politeness was unfailing and his greeting cordial as if being asked questions on every conceivable subject from woman suffrage in Great Britain to the caste system in India was a delightful novelty.

The New Palace of the Gaekwar at Baroda

Mr. Van Ess introduced the writer, and when his highness stood up and extended his hand, the Gaekwar appeared to be one of the most up-to-date rulers; and when he spoke in better English than was at the command of many people who have lived here from birth, the vision of an Oriental potentate, which had been fading rapidly during the chase about the boat, disappeared completely. The Gaekwar appeared as he does at home, as he long ago adopted European clothes and ways. His son, Prince Jaisinh, and the aid-de-camp were equally modern in their personal appearance. The Prince is now in his junior year at Harvard, and went on to Banff to meet his father. There is another son at Oxford, and another at a preparatory school.

With the Gaekwar was his wife, the Maharanee, and their daughter, the Princess Indiraraji, who is about seventeen. The princess would be called pretty in any country, and her mother has a fine and intelligent face. They both seem to have enjoyed the long journey through strange lands, and talked in excellent English of conditions in India and of the various topics which interest the cultivated woman everywhere. They have not been drawn to the fashions of Paris and wore their own picturesque costume of dark reds and blues ornamented with a glint of gold and the shimmer of priceless jewels.

"Oh, yes, I have heard of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S work in famine relief in India," said the Gaekwar. "It was a great work and accomplished much good." Mention was made of the fact that the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD had supported several thousand famine orphans in India for ten years, fitting them to meet the struggle for existence in one of the world's most crowded countries.

"Yes, I know about it," said the Gaekwar. "I believe we have an orphanage under Christian missionary auspices in Baroda." On being told that these orphan boys and girls were taught trades in many of the orphanages he was much interested. "The missionaries are very successful," he said, "in their work among the lower classes. They do much for them in improving their morals, helping to educate them and to raise them to a higher level. I do not know that I can say that they will ever be able to convert India as a whole to the Christian religion, as a large part of the population are satisfied with the philosophic religions of the East; but their educational work will progress, for the hope of India is in education.

"It has been difficult for me to carry out my ideas in a country bound so rigidly to the caste system as

AMERICAN PULPIT

A Sermon by

Rev. R. A. Torrey, D.D.*

The Most Important Business of Life

TEXT: Amos 4:12—"Prepare to meet thy God."

I AM sure that there is not in the whole Bible a commandment that is more important or more reasonable or more solemn than that. God has three ways in which he speaks to us. First of all, he speaks to us in his written word, the Bible. Second, he speaks to us by his providences, and third, he speaks to us by the still small voice of his Spirit in our hearts. And in all these three ways God is saying over and over and over again: "Prepare to meet thy God." That is the constant refrain of the Bible. And that is the thing that God is constantly saying to us by his providences. Every great calamity that overtakes men is a call from God to the men that are left to prepare to meet him.

The first thing our text teaches us, and the providence of God teaches us, and the voice of the Spirit teaches us, is that we must all meet God. Let these words sink into your heart. We all must meet God. Just a little way ahead of every one of us in this hall to-night there is a great experience. In just a few years at the very outside every one of us that is in this hall to-night is going to pass out of this present life into another life and the first thing that awaits every one of us in that other life is a face-to-face meeting with God. "It is appointed unto men once to die, and after that the judgment." "So then every one of us shall give account of himself to God." Judgment lies just ahead, perhaps a few weeks, perhaps a few months, perhaps a few years, but just a little way ahead every one of us is going to pass out of this life into another and the very first thing that awaits us in that other life is a face-to-face meeting with God. So the most important question that confronts every man and woman in this building to-night is this: Are you ready to meet God? Oh, happy is the one who is so perfectly in the line of God's will that he is ready at any moment to meet God himself. Happy is the one who has such an assurance that he is at peace with God that he can look death itself right in the eye and cheerfully and gladly say: "Come on, I am not a bit afraid of you. Come on, I am ready to meet God."

The Soul's Peace with God

Across the ocean in the old country a woman lay dying. Her vicar heard that she was dying and hastened to her bedside. He sat down beside her and tried to break the news as gently as he could. He said, "Madam, they think your time is very short. They think you must die." "Oh, yes," she said, "I know it. I know my time is very short." He said, "Madam, do you realize that the first thing when you die is a meeting with God?" "Yes," she said, "I realize it." "Have you made your peace with God?" "No," she replied, "I haven't made my peace with God." "Then are you not afraid to die?" "No," she said, "not a particle." "Do you realize you are dying now? Do you realize you have only a few hours at the most to live, and do you realize that just as soon as you die, you must meet God? Do you realize that in just a few hours at the outside you must meet God?" "Yes." "And you have not made your peace with God?" "No, sir, and I am not going to." "And you are not afraid to meet God?" "Not a particle," she said. There was a strange light of perfect peace in the woman's eyes and the vicar realized there was something back of it all. He said, "What do you mean?" She said, "Listen! I know I am dying. I know that at the outside I have but a few hours to live. I know I shall meet God face to face and I haven't made my peace with God, and yet I have not a fear of meeting God. I am resting in the peace that Jesus Christ made in his atoning death upon the cross, and I don't have to make my peace with God, for I am resting in the peace that Jesus Christ has already made." Oh, happy is the man or woman who so believes God's testimony about Jesus, namely, that when he died on the cross for you and me he made peace for us by the blood of his cross and therefore we do not need to make peace, and who is so calmly resting in that peace that he can look death itself in the eye and say, "Come on, I am not afraid to meet God. There is not a cloud between God and me."

The second thing our text teaches us is that in order to meet God satisfactorily, in order to meet him with peace and joy and not with fear and dismay, we must prepare for that meeting. "Prepare to meet thy God." I cannot think of any greater madness of which any one can be guilty than the madness of fancying that one can meet such a Being as we know God to be in a satisfactory way without earnest previous preparation. And yet that is the madness that the average man and woman is guilty of to-night. You are making no earnest preparation. You are just drifting, thinking that though you go drifting through life, somehow or other when the time of meeting comes, you will be prepared for that meeting. Why, no one would dream of meeting an earthly king without preparation; how much less the eternal King? When any one in London has an audience with the king, he is sent before he goes into the king's presence to one whose business it is to teach him how to come into the king's presence and how to back out of the king's presence; just what he must wear; just how he must approach the king; just what he must do. There is not a sane Englishman in Great Britain who would dream of going into the presence of King George without previous preparation. And yet you think you can go into the presence of the One who created King George and all the other kings of earth, that One so holy that the very seraphim veil their faces and their feet in his presence and cry, "Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord God Almighty." You fancy that somehow or other you can go into the presence of that great King, immortal, eternal, invisible, whom no man has seen nor can see and not perish, without earnest and protracted and thorough preparation. Is it not madness?

The Need of Preparation

Once in the home of Lord —— in Scotland, Lady —— was showing to Mrs. Torrey the robes she wore at the coronation. As she was showing her these robes she said, "There was a singular thing happened at the coronation. Right near me a lady came in, a member of the nobility, whose rank nobody questioned. But," she said, "we had all been instructed just what to wear and just how to come in. This lady came in, beautifully dressed, magnificently dressed, but she did not have on the prescribed garment. One of the marshals came down and called her out. She said she was a titled lady, but sternly the marshal called her out, 'You have not on the prescribed robe,' and she had to leave the Abbey in disgrace." And yet you fancy you can go into the presence of the King Eternal who created the earth and the sun and the moon and the stars and this whole universe with some other kind of preparation than he himself prescribes. You will go out into eternity disgraced forever. You must prepare beforehand. And preparation to meet such a person as God takes time. If one of these children here should start out to-night to prepare to meet God and should make that preparation the whole work of a lifetime, he would not be any too well prepared. You men and women who take Christ in advanced life, I am not saying you will be lost, but you will not be so well prepared to meet God as the children, who take Christ in their childhood and spend a lifetime in preparation. There you see the madness of deathbed repentances. To think a man can live in sin and selfishness and perhaps in lust and then just a few moments before death prepare for a satisfactory meeting with God! A man may be saved on his deathbed, but he won't be prepared for such a meeting with God as we ought all to desire. Full preparation to meet God is a matter of a whole lifetime, and if we begin in earliest boyhood or earliest girlhood and give our whole life to it, we will be none too ready and none too fully prepared.

Sins Confessed and Sins Covered

Again, in order to meet God, we must not only put sin out of our lives, we must also confess our sins. We read in Prov. 28: 13, "He that covereth his sins shall not prosper: but whoso confesseth and forsaketh them shall have mercy." It is not enough to quit your sin. You must own it up. You must confess it definitely to God. David sinned. He was sorry he had and he turned from it, but he would not confess it and in the 32d Psalm he tells us what kind of a time he had, "When I kept silence, my bones waxed old through my roaring all the day long. For day and night thy hand was heavy upon me: my moisture is turned into the drought of summer. I acknowledged my sin unto thee, and mine iniquity have I not hid. I said, I will confess my transgressions unto the Lord; and thou forgavest the iniquity of my sin." Not until sin is confessed is sin forgiven and covered. If you try to cover your sins from the eye of God, God will uncover them to the whole world sooner or later, but if you will uncover your sin before the eye of God in honest, earnest confession, God will cover them so deep they will never be seen again. You must confess every sin to God to start with. Then if you have sinned against your fellow men you must confess to them. And if you have sinned publicly, your confession of sin must be as public as your sin. That does not mean you have to tell everybody everything you have done. The secret things that the world does not know about, confess to God; those you have committed against definite people, confess to the people against whom you have committed them; but every public sin should be as publicly confessed as it is committed.

Righting a Life's Wrongs

Again, in order to meet God satisfactorily, you must set right the wrongs you have done as far as lies in your power to do it. Of course, if it is out of your power, you will have to leave it with God but as far as it is in your power, you must set right the wrongs you have done. If you owe debts, you must pay them up. You know there is one thing I cannot understand: those Christians, or professed Christians, who do not pay their honest debts 100 cents on the dollar. If you owe money go and pay it, every penny of it. If you have wronged anybody it is your duty to set the wrong right if it lies in your power. When we were in West Virginia, a very prominent business man got under very deep conviction. He wanted to see me and have a private talk with me. When he came in he said: "What I want to see you about is this. I used to be an active member in the Church and my brother also, and we failed in business and we paid thirty-three and a third cents on the dollar and we went through bankruptcy. We were quit of all responsibility by the law, but I backslid. Since then I have been prospered in business and I now am able to pay the other sixty-six and two-thirds cents on the dollar. Now," he said, "tell me, do you think that in order to get right with God and take my place in the church I ought to pay that other sixty-six and two-thirds cents on the dollar even though they have no legal claim on me?" "Beyond a question. The fact that you have gone through bankruptcy and are quit of it by law has nothing to do with your moral responsibility, and as now you are able to pay, if you want to get right with God you must do it." Do you know what he said? He said, "I will do it." I tell you it was worth while. If you have told lies about other people, it is your business to set those lies straight. I tell you that will give many of you people a lot of business. I want to say to you that to blacken a woman's reputation is far viler and meaner and baser than to steal $100,000 from her. If any of you folks have been telling anything that is not true about anybody else if you want to be ready to meet God, and you will have to very soon, you had better get busy just as quick as you can straightening out the lies you have told and face the music and say right out, "When I told that story about Mrs. So and So, I lied." Don't try to gloss it over. Call it a lie like a man; say, "I lied." That will be very humiliating. Some of you that boast of your own goodness and try to establish your own goodness by trying to pull other people down, it will be very humiliating for you to go and own up you lied, but you had better humiliate yourself now than to have to face God with a slander on your lips that you have not straightened out.

Again, in order to be ready to meet God, we must accept Jesus Christ as our Saviour. It is not enough to forsake your sin. It is not enough to confess your sin. It is not enough to do everything in your power to set your sin straight. In addition, you must accept the crucified Christ as your Saviour from the guilt of sin. If you should start out to-night and never sin again, that would not set you right with God, for there are sins you have already committed and that have got to be covered, and no right-doing from this time on will cover the sins already committed. There is only one thing in all the universe that will cover sin already committed, and that is the atoning blood of Jesus Christ.

You must accept him as your risen Saviour to keep you from sin in the future. Suppose you should come to Christ and accept him as your Saviour from the guilt of sin, you would still need some one to keep you from the power of sin, and so God has not only provided for us a crucified Saviour to cover the sins of the past, but has provided a risen Saviour to give us power to get victory over sin in the future. In order to be prepared to meet God you must accept the crucified Christ to give you pardon for the sins of the past and the risen Christ to keep you from the power of sin day by day in the future. You must also openly confess this Christ whom you have accepted before the world. This is God's command. Jesus says in Matt. 10: 32, 33, "Whosoever therefore shall confess me before men, him will I confess also before my Father which is in heaven. But whosoever shall deny me before men, him will I also deny before my Father which is in heaven." I believe there are a great many men and women who think that they have accepted Christ in the secrecy of their hearts, but they have never stood up and confessed him. Any man or woman who goes out of this world without having publicly confessed the Christ they have accepted is not ready to meet God. In Rom. 10: 9, 10, we read: "If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved. For with the heart man believeth unto righteousness; and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation."

I put to each of you the question: Are you prepared to meet God? If not, will you begin to prepare to-night? Friends, listen: more of the men and women who are in this audience to-night will be lost through delay than in any other way. Almost every one of you intends to prepare some day. I don't believe there are ten persons in any religious audience who don't intend to get ready some time. But, you say, "I won't begin to get ready just yet." If you don't begin to prepare now, you won't be as fully prepared even if you begin next Sunday, and some of you will lose your souls, if you don't begin this very hour to get ready to meet God.

Archæus was at one time a king in Greece. Some of his subjects hated him. He was a tyrant and they planned to put him to death. A friend of Archæus got wind of the conspiracy, got all the facts, wrote them down and put the packet into a messenger's hand and said: "Take this to the king. Get into the king's presence at any cost. Put it into the king's hands and say to the king, 'The friend who sends this begs of you to read it at once, for it contains serious matters.' " The messenger made his way into the king's palace. The king was giving a banquet to some of his friends, but in some way the messenger got into the banqueting hall and put the package into the king's hands and said: "The friend who sends this begs of the king that he shall read it at once, for it contains serious matters." King Archæus lightly tossed it aside and said: "Serious matters to-morrow." When the morrow broke Archæus was a corpse, for the conspiracy had ripened that night. As the messenger of the Lord God Almighty, I bring you a packet that contains serious matters—"Prepare to meet thy God," and I beg of you to attend to it at once. If any of you toss it lightly aside and say, "Serious matters to-morrow," you may lose your soul forever.

THE LITTLE WINDOW DOOR

By Rev. J. M. FARRAR, D.D.*

WHY do you have a front door in your home? I hear Ben say: "Foolish question number ten." Would not a back door do just as well as a front door? You say "No," because your friends do not come in that way. Would you laugh if I talked about a door in the roof? In a few years many of your homes will have a door in the roof. The maid will hear the horn, and up in the elevator she will go to open the roof-door. Friends in an aeroplane have dropped down for a call. Father will say, "Fasten your machine to the chimney and stay for dinner." We shall keep the front door, as the old folks will come later in an automobile and the little boys and girls will run in that way from school.

THERE is one person who does not come into the home through any door. He entereth not by the door, but climbs up some other way. He does not blow a horn, nor ring a bell, nor send in his card. The Bible calls him thief. He is not a friend, but an enemy, and wants to get in and get out before you know it. The months of July and August are not his vacation time. He prefers to call when we are away or fast asleep.

HAVE you ever thought of your body as a house with doors through which your friends come in to visit you? Your ears are doors, your eyes are windows. Hearing, seeing, smelling, tasting, touching, these are all doors in your house. Try and count how many callers and visitors come each day to talk with you. Are you guarding every door so as to keep the thief out? The thief who wants to steal your good name, to steal your pure thought, to steal your character. But thieves do not always come in through the door. They get in some other way. There is a thief called sin and some of us believe he got in before the house was finished. This thief got into the garden of Eden. Possibly he got in before the garden was fenced. He came in the form of a serpent. He is in your body, or house. How are you to get him out? Listen!

"A GREAT and deadly serpent entered into a house and made its abode in a hole in the wall. The family was greatly alarmed, and the neighbors came running to know what was the matter. 'A snake, a deadly snake, has come here to live! Oh, what shall we do?' Said one, 'Have the house thoroughly whitewashed.' Said another, 'Have it painted, too, and send for a carpenter to mend all the doors and windows.' Said a third, 'Send for a teacher who will tell you how to be good moral people.' Well, the house was whitewashed and painted, and the teacher told them how to be moral, and the family, feeling safe, ate, drank, and slept in the house in peace. About a month afterwards, one dark night, when all were asleep, the snake came out of his hole and bit the father and he died. Two nights after the reptile bit the son, and he died, too."

JUNIORS, do you know the meaning of this parable? The house is the body, the hole in the inner wall is the heart, the serpent is sin. By all your washings and daubings and trying to be good you will no more get sin out of your heart than they get the serpent out of that house by lime and paint. Christ is the only remedy. Believe in Christ and he will take sin from your heart.

But we have talked long enough about doors, windows and snakes. I am going to tell you a story. Evelyn and her mamma went to Grandma Stone's and Evelyn was left in the library alone. There were some beautiful flowers on the table. "I wish I had just one bloom to take home," she said to herself; "grandma's sick upstairs, anyhow, and I know Robert don't ever care to smell 'em." Robert was the colored butler. Evelyn put out her little hand, and the white blossom was in great danger, but a sound in the hall startled her; she dropped back on the sofa and mamma came in.

HOW quickly mothers do see things! There was a look in Evelyn's eye that told this mother the whole story, but she didn't say anything about it at first. She put on the little girl's coat and hat, and they set out for home.

"Once there was a band of robbers," said mamma, "and they came to a castle by night and tried to break in; but the walls were strong and the door was tight, and they could not get in. Presently one of them found a tiny little window unbarred, and so small that he could only thrust his head in. What did they do? Why, they found a little boy, and they put him through the narrow window, and he unlocked the big window, and so all the robbers got into the castle."

"Is that all the story, mamma?" asked Evelyn with much interest.

"That is not quite all. The rest is to show what it means. When a little girl does something that seems a little wrong—only a very little wrong, indeed, like pulling grandma's flowers without leave—that is like putting the little thief inside the castle. The little wrong makes it easier to do a bigger and bigger wrong. The only safe thing is to keep the little window shut and not open it to any little wrongdoing, however small."

"HE that entereth not by the door into the sheepfold, but climbeth up some other way, the same is a thief and a robber. But he that entereth in by the door is the shepherd of the sheep. To him the porter openeth."

* Pastor 1st Ref'd Ch., B'klyn, N.Y. TEXT: "He that entereth not by the door." John 10:1.

"It's Time to Start, Jim"

"JIM, it is time to do and dare;
Get in the thick of the fight, my son;
Love will be guarding you everywhere,
Mother's and mine—when the day is won.
Over the day of the books and school,
Past are the dreams of the idle while;
Now 'tis a battle for Right and Rule,
Now for a frown where you used to smile.

"Jim, it is time for the restless town,
Singing and throbbing with life anew.
Go for a 'name' and a proud renown,
Go for the best that a man may do.
Mother and I, in the twilight here,
We shall be waiting to hear your part
Blessings, our boy, and we hold most dear
That which is nearest the parent heart.

"Jim, it is time for the sturdy hand;
Time for the eye that is clear and bright,
Time for the head that must understand,
Time for the laboring, day and night.
Ah, how we love you and see you start
Out on the mart of a million deeds!
Still, though a humble or higher art,
Love is the boon that a good boy needs."

The Progress of Woman

—IT IS PROBABLE that the monthly paper, Progress, published in New York, will soon be merged into the Woman's Journal, the long-established Boston weekly, edited by Alice Stone Blackwell.

—MISS KATE M. GORDON has just been elected a vice-president of the National Woman Suffrage Association. She is the daughter of a noted Southern educator, and is "easily the South's most prominent woman citizen," says one who has always known her family. She has done a noble work in improving civic conditions in New Orleans, especially in securing its present water and drainage system. For this service she was given a great public reception and a gold medal. She is a very good and able woman.

—AMERICAN VISITORS notice at once in Australia, where woman suffrage has existed for many years, the desire on the part of the women to inform themselves on political subjects. Instead of Shakespeare or Browning Clubs, the women oftenest band together in political study clubs. This helps to prove the great saying of Gladstone, that "it is liberty alone that fits for liberty." It is a significant fact there that though women divide themselves there like men between the leading political parties, yet when matters affecting the home, the school or public morals are in question, they all stand together.

—ONE OF THE greatest triumphs of the suffragists in Colorado has been the recent election of Miss Ellis Meredith, who ran as an independent candidate for election commissioner. Her majority exceeded that of her seven competitors combined. When the Board of Election Commissioners met, they chose Miss Meredith as their president. In her official capacity she is empowered to direct and govern all elections, make the appointments for the canvass, judges, clerks, watchers, etc.; in case of a contest, to have charge of the recount; to supervise everything pertaining to elections. The salary is $1,200 and the term is for four years. In every respect Miss Meredith is fully qualified for the position.

—REV. ANNA H. SHAW has recently given a lecture upon woman suffrage before the Civic Club of the University of Virginia, at Charlottesville, one of the most conservative of Southern towns. The night was stormy, but the audience was large and enthusiastic. Several prominent women, including Miss Mary Johnston, the distinguished novelist, sat upon the platform. Miss Shaw made an eloquent address, and was followed by Miss Johnston in what Miss Shaw describes as "one of the cleverest, most telling short speeches I have ever heard." The sentiment in the place was changed by these deliverances from hostility to friendliness, and a young student arose and called for three cheers for the cause.

Among the Workers

—AN ORDAINED CLERGYMAN, experienced as an evangelist, would take charge of mission work or fill openings as pulpit supply. Unsectarian, Hebrew and Greek scholar, with degrees from two leading universities. He may be addressed, "Pastor, care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD."

—REV. W. H. COLLINSON, of the United Christian Workers' Mission, 728 East Two Hundred and Twenty-second Street, Williamsbridge, N. Y., has completed forty years of faithful service among the poor by preaching, visitation, etc. It is now proposed to establish a Rescue Hall as a centre for the work. Mr. Collinson will gladly communicate with all interested parties.

—ON SUNDAY, MAY 29, a fire in which four persons were killed and several injured, ruined the mission property at 15 and 17 Doyers Street, New York. There was no insurance. The mission is now trying to refurnish and will welcome assistance. Temporary headquarters have been secured at the Mariner's Temple near by. When the Stork Visits a Palace

The Cradle for the Son of the King

The Great Workshop in Madrid Where Baby Clothes Are Made for Princes

A Layette for a Royal Heir

ELABORATE preparations are made for the coming of a child in a royal household. It is doubtful if more extensive preparations were ever made for any royal baby than those that were made for the coming of the children of King Alfonso and Queen Victoria. The royal layette comprised garments enough for a dozen babies, and many of these garments are of the daintiest description. Queen Victoria has a great fondness for fine things. The girls in the Spanish convent in Madrid spent weeks working exclusively on the layette of the expected heir to the throne, and when he finally made his appearance, there was ready for him one of the most extensive wardrobes ever prepared for any baby. The nursery was filled with costly furnishings and the royal cradle was worth a small fortune.

This tiny scion of royalty began his earthly career in a suite of rooms planned entirely by his mother. The etiquette of a throne demanded that she should conform her own ideas to those of others in many things; but when it came to providing for her baby she let it be known that she meant to have her own way. The nursery provided for her children includes a large living-room, dining-room, bedrooms for the babies and the head nurse, bathroom and a sewing-room. The living-room is all in green and white and pink. There is a vaulted ceiling enameled in white, and round the walls a procession of animals that look as if they were just emerging from the ark. There are rose-tinted carpets. The rest of the furnishings are washable and are kept simply spotless. All of the window-sills are cushioned, and there is hardly any chance for one of the royal babies to hurt itself by tumbling down.

In the bedroom are several beautiful paintings, such as would be apt to hold the attention of a child. These are called "Morning," "Noon" and "Night." The first is a beautiful picture representing a baby awaking. The next is "Noon," and shows the child with spoon and porringer, while the third painting, "Night," represents him with his little hands folded in prayer just before he gets into bed.

The royal cradle is an elaborate affair in which the father and the grandfather of the children of the royal Spanish nursery have successively slept when babies. The queen gave some of the Spanish grandees a shock by removing the elaborate lace draperies of the royal cradle, because she thought they excluded the air. She gave the whole nursery an air of brightness and grace unknown to the royal nursery of Spain, for the Royal Palace had always been heavy and sombre in its furnishings.

The birth of a child in a royal palace involves a great deal of formality, as may be known from the following rules of procedure governing an event of this kind: "All of the persons designated by the king in the decree shall be notified to come to the palace in full uniform. Immediately after the child is born, the Mistress of the Robes shall inform the Prime Minister, who shall then announce to the persons present the sex of the child, at the same time informing the Captain General and the Commander of the Royal Halberdiers, so that they may give the orders for the proper signals and salutes. In order that the inhabitants may know whether the newly-born child is a prince or a princess, the royal standard shall be hoisted over the palace and a salute of twenty-one guns fired in case it should be a prince, and if a princess, a salute of fifteen guns fired and a white flag hoisted. Should the event occur during the night either a colored lantern or a white light shall be hoisted, as the case may be. As soon as this has been carried out the child shall be presented to the diplomatic corps and the other personages present by the Prime Minister, accompanied by the Mistress of the Robes and the chief court chamberlains. The Minister of Justice, as king's notary, will then draw up the certificate of birth and record of the presentation, thus terminating the ceremony." Such is the imposing ceremonial which is followed substantially in all the royal courts of the Old World when the stork comes to the palace.

JOHN L. HARBOUR.

Was Carl Etherington a Martyr?

SINCE the killing of Haddock, in the early days of the prohibition excitement, many years ago, nothing that has occurred in the West has excited more interest than the lynching of Carl Etherington, the anti-saloon detective, at Newark, O., on July 8. There were so many conflicting stories circulated concerning this affair that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD decided to investigate, and with that end in view wrote to several residents of Newark.

Etherington, who was an officer of the Licking County Law Enforcement League, at 1.30 in the afternoon of July 8 had raided a notorious "speak-easy" saloon called the "Last Chance," which was kept by William Howard, formerly Chief of Police of Newark. In the scuffle that took place during the raid, black-jacks were used by the saloonists. Several pistol shots were fired and Etherington's life was unquestionably in danger. In the melée, a bullet from his weapon struck Howard, and the latter fell to the floor, mortally injured. Howard was taken to the hospital and died the same evening.

In order properly to understand the situation, it should be explained that there has been for some time a County Option Law in Licking County, which the officials were careless in enforcing. They allowed the saloon element the utmost liberty and the law was practically a dead letter. This deliberate neglect stirred the "dry" element of the population to activity, and when the news came of the shooting at Howard's, the general conviction among the temperance people was that Etherington must have fired in self-defense.

When Howard's death became known, the liquor element were immediately roused to fury by the fall of their champion. A mob soon gathered in front of the county jail, to which Etherington had been taken, and began to attack the doors. Sheriff Lincke and his deputies were apparently either frightened or incapable; at all events, the furious mob soon succeeded in battering in the doors. Etherington was found at prayer in his cell. He had just penned a brief note of farewell to his parents, expecting every moment to find himself in the hands of the lynchers. When he was seized and dragged out, he found voice to tell them that he had not intended to kill Howard, but had simply fired in self-defense. His explanation was cut short by the crazed mob and he was strung up to a telegraph pole, where he hung for an hour. It is said that there were hundreds of women and children in the crowd, and that no member of the mob was masked.

Mr. Wayne B. Wheeler, superintendent of the Ohio Anti-Saloon League, has sent this statement of the affair to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

> The disgraceful lynching at Newark, O., followed an attempt on the part of twenty secret service men, who were deputized as special officers of the law, to serve search warrants on "speak-easies." The mayor of the city of Newark and the police force had refused to enforce the law which is in effect in that city to prohibit the sale of liquor. Special officers were deputized by the mayor of Granville, who has jurisdiction in these cases throughout the county, to serve the warrants. When the officers entered the places where the liquor was sold, a mob gathered in front of the building at once. The special officers were attacked, and they arrested two men and took them to the county jail. The officials in charge refused to receive one of the men arrested and made the special officers leave the building.
> During the disturbance which followed the raid, one of the special officers, named Etherington, shot a "speak-easy" keeper, who was assaulting him with a black-jack. A fair-sized mob had gathered and were aiding Howard in abusing Etherington, threatening to lynch him. They had followed him for a long distance. The regular police force of the city gave the special officers no protection, but on the other hand arrested most of these special officers and took them to the city prison. This encouraged the mob, and later in the evening they lynched Etherington.
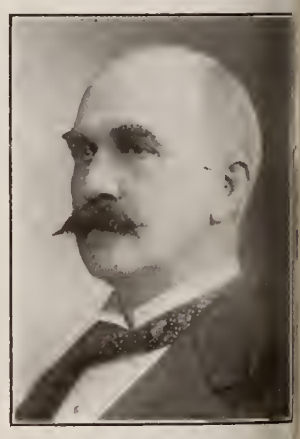
> After the lynching, the special officers were turned out of jail at midnight with no protection, their fire-arms having been taken from them. Etherington and the other officers working with him were acting in strict conformity to the law. Etherington's last words sent to his mother that he met death doing his duty, were true. Such outbreaks intensify and increase temperance sentiment instead of intimidating it.

Public opinion in Ohio and throughout the country was so deeply stirred by the lynching of Etherington, that Governor Harmon decided to make an investigation, to ascertain whether the local or county officials were to blame. Adjutant-General Weybrecht and other officers began a rigid inquiry and the county grand jury also took up the matter vigorously. The Governor's first step was to suspend Mayor Atherton of Newark and County Sheriff Lincke. Two negroes, who assisted in battering down the jail doors, were arrested. J. Ankele, vice mayor (who became executive on Mayor Atherton's suspension), summarily removed Chief of Police Zergerbeil and Police Captain Robert Bell, on the ground of their non-enforcement of the option law, and appointed Charles Hindel as chief and Charles Swank as captain, at the same time giving orders for the strictest enforcement of the long-neglected laws. Formal charges have been prepared against Sheriff Lincke for failure to stop the lynching. These charges are signed by leading residents in Newark and have been forwarded to Governor Harmon.



Governor Judson Harmon

Judge Charles W. Seward of Newark, before whom the case will probably come, is quoted as saying that the city has for years been in the hands of lawbreakers and that the courts have been defied. The recent tragedy has fully awakened the law-abiding element to the necessity of action, and they will see that the lynchers are punished. It would seem that the death of Etherington may thus become the means of bringing about a great moral uprising in certain sections of Ohio, which might have been delayed for years, and that the lawless saloons, which have been the cause of all the trouble, may be dealt with as they deserve.

Etherington's body was taken to his parents' home at Willisburg, where the funeral was held. His mother is prostrated with grief; his father holds that the young man was a martyr to duty.

THE RISE OF THE BOY SCOUTS

AMERICAN visitors who have been making motor tours through England during the last two summers have seen at surprisingly frequent intervals groups of sturdy boys dressed in an adaptation of frontier costume marching along the hedge-bordered highroads or camped under the shade of some wayside grove. On a school holiday in London, Manchester, Liverpool and other large centres these same groups, under the command of an older lad, could be seen making their way on foot or by tram toward the suburbs or parks with an air that seemed to say that they had serious and interesting work before them—work and play combined—for they were the already famous Boy Scouts organized two and a half years ago by General Sir

A Halt for Lunch

R. S. Baden-Powell. Baden-Powell, it will be remembered, is that same doughty soldier who held Mafeking against overwhelming odds in the South African War, and who distinguished himself in other ways, until in the last decade he has become one of Great Britain's popular heroes, classed with Earl Roberts and Lord Kitchener.

Intensely patriotic and believing firmly that the future of his country depends on the type of young men it produces, he founded the Boy Scouts as a practical school of manliness in which love of God and country, courtesy, courage and a sense of true honor should be inculcated. The idea took at once with the public, and there are now enrolled in Great Britain over 400,000 Boy Scouts, who have taken the Scout's pledge, and who are manfully trying to live up to the high ideals taught in the Scout law. Some time ago twenty thousand Scouts assembled in London and under the command of their superior officers marched through the streets while the cheering crowds gave ample evidence of the strong hold the new movement has on the public mind. Now Canada has been swept with a similar wave of enthusiasm and the Boy Scouts are there numbered by the thousands. Here in the United States patrols have been formed from Massachusetts to Kansas, and every week come in reports from Young Men's Christian Associations, Sunday Schools, boys' clubs and other organizations interested in the welfare of the boy, taking up the idea and forming patrols. Seven or more boys may form a patrol. Three patrols form a troop.

Some people have conceived the erroneous idea that the Boy Scouts are being trained exclusively for military purposes, whereas the truth of the matter is that they are being trained for good citizenship. Of course, the military virtues—such as obedience to properly constituted authority, respect for the commands of the officers, truth and courage—are in the rules and regulations to which they subscribe, and rightly so. Out of the thirty-six badges which a Boy Scout may obtain by performing certain services only one is given of a military character. In fact, Baden-Powell refers to the Scout movement as "peace scouting." It is a character-forming movement for boys who are just at the age when they are reaching the two roads, one leading to an upright honorable career where high ideals are found, the other which leads downward, ever bending away from true attainment and honorable success.

Recently a mass meeting was held in New York and plans laid for forming a permanent central committee. A temporary committee was selected, which will later report on the best plan for a permanent organization. Among those taking an active part were General Wingate, Ernest Thompson Seton, the naturalist and author, Dan Beard, known to every boy in America, and leaders in social work, settlements, playground associations, Sunday Schools, and the Young Men's Christian Association. Among the latter was Mr. John L. Alexander, who for years has been active in work for boys, and who for the present has devoted himself to this new work of organizing the Boy Scouts of America. He is just the man for the place. Full of enthusiasm over the project, he has made others as sanguine as himself, and is enlisting the aid of prominent men all over the country. The headquarters are at 124 East Twenty-eighth Street, New York. Ernest Thompson Seton has just completed the Scout's Manual, similar to Baden-Powell's book, but adapted to American conditions.

The Scouts take the following pledge: "On my honor I promise that I will do my best to do my duty to God and my country, to help other people at all times, to obey the Scout Law. The essentials of the Scout Law are that a Scout's honor is to be trusted. A Scout is loyal to his country, his officers, his employers and his parents. He must be useful and help others. A Scout is a friend to all, and a brother to every other Scout, no matter to what social class the other belongs. A Scout is courteous, he is a friend to animals, he obeys orders of his parents and officers. A Scout smiles and whistles under all circumstances. A Scout is thrifty."

There are three classes of Scouts and the tests are not child's play by any means. At first a boy is classed as a Tenderfoot, but even for this classification he has to be able to tie four different kinds of knots the proper way, to fly the flag, to know something of its story and the Scout laws. The second-class men must be able to pass in first aid to the injured and in signaling, to build a fire with only two matches, to cut a camp dinner with only the regulation billy, to track half a mile in twenty-five minutes, or in town to describe the contents of one shop window out of four observed for one minute. The test for a first-class Scout embraces a good knowledge of camping and woodcraft. He must swim fifty yards, go on foot or row a boat seven miles and return, and write a report on the trip. Supposed to take two days, but can in less. In signaling he must send and receive sixteen words per minute, describe the way of saving life in ordinary accidents; such as drowning, runaway and ice breaking. This is only part of the list, and the boys are on their mettle to pass and become first-class Scouts. Religion is brought in as a natural and not unnatural thing. The boys are pledged to do at least one act for some one else once a day. Some of the most unruly boys who have joined have come under the chivalric influence of the rest of the Scouts and have been completely transformed in character.

Mr. Alexander believes that the work should be done through bodies already organized, and independent Scouts are not enrolled. The Scout movement is designed to help organizations in the work for boys; not to create a rival interest.

Ruling Out the Bible

ILLINOIS has ruled the Bible out of her public schools. The Supreme Court of that State has decreed its exclusion, on the ground that its compulsory use is an interference with religious liberty. We believe that this action will cause regret to many in that State, who rightly hold that the principles inculcated in the Bible are the very basis of good citizenship. To make the school godless by excluding the Bible is to expose the rising generation to a great moral danger. At the present time, the people of Illinois are confronted with a striking illustration of the absence of moral safeguards in high official places. How can its citizens expect to improve the tone of public morals when they remove from the schools the only Book that can lay the foundation of good character? Is it not putting a premium on wickedness to shut out the best moral instructor the world has ever known? "Blessed is the people whose God is the Lord." On the other hand, we have the explicit warning of what shall befall those who "forget God." In every country where the Bible has had free course, it has brought with it unnumbered blessings, and wherever it has been deliberately suppressed, these blessings have been noticeably absent. Pagan philosophy is the poorest kind of substitute for the living Word. Any community which refuses recognition to the Bible must ultimately be forced to admit that there is no substitute that can take its place. We look for a reaction in Illinois. In several localities in other States, where anti-Christian influences have temporarily prevailed in shutting out God's Word from the schools, the experiment has proved unsatisfying. One community in Michigan—a suburb of Detroit—a few days ago restored the Bible to the schools by an overwhelming vote. The truth is that if our schools are to have moral teaching at all, it must be based upon the Bible. Its teachings and principles are the sum of all the wisdom that has been given to the human race. It has inspired the greatest lives in our country's history. Bar sectarianism by all means; but to shut out the Bible is the last step of bigotry, since it is the foundation stone of the world's moral progress. One might as well shut out the sunlight and the free air of heaven and expect health to follow as to hope to make good Americans of our children while denying them access to the divine law of life and conduct. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD would be pleased to hear from its Illinois readers on this vital question. Let them write us briefly giving a frank expression of their views. In these days of widespread indifference to the essentials of religion, it should be the duty of every right-thinking man and woman to stand by the old Bible as the heritage of our children.

What India's "Unrest" Means

OUR distinguished visitor, the Gaekwar of Baroda, has departed. While here, this urbane and accomplished prince had little to say regarding the political unrest in India, although he spoke freely on other topics. To him it was doubtless an acute question, which he could not touch without giving offense to one side or the other. One of the best-known American missionaries in India, Mr. M. B. Fuller, of Bombay, who reached New York as the Gaekwar was departing, during a brief visit at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offices gave a very clear interpretation of the present situation in India. There are in that country some 400 native princes, each of whom rules in his own territory, the integrity of which is assured by England. Freedom of religion is also guaranteed, and the peace of the country is preserved by an efficient native police under a general English administration. Racial and religious rivalries and other conflicting interests are kept in harmonious order. To grant autonomy to India, to remove the governing and directing hand of Britain, would precipitate an immediate change. The great empire of two hundred million souls would be defenseless, for India would have no navy of her own and she would become the prey of the first naval power that could reach her coasts—Japan, Germany, or France. Russia could throw a million troops across her northern border unhindered. There could be no unity of interest or action among the native States for national defense. Soon the end would come in a general break-up of the great Indian empire which England wrested from internal anarchy and external enemies nearly a hundred and fifty years ago and has held compactly together ever since. This inner knowledge of the situation and its fateful possibilities is what keeps the native princes, the leading thinkers and the native merchants of India loyal to its present government. They shrink at an agitation which has for its object a reformation that might involve the dismemberment and ruin of their native land.

A Scheme Doomed to Failure

PRESIDENT MADRIZ of Nicaragua, having been unable to date to crush the rebellion led by Estrada, has bethought himself of the expedient of calling in foreign aid to neutralize the power of the United States and secure his recognition by other governments. It is reported on good authority that he has offered an island off the coast of Nicaragua to a foreign Power, which could be used as a naval base on this side of the Atlantic. Of course the payment for the island would be financial and military support.

President Madriz has forgotten, apparently, that he is not at liberty to establish foreign Powers in naval stations on this side of the Atlantic. There is a certain "Monroe Doctrine," which, though variously interpreted and often criticised abroad, has been very successful in preventing foreign governments from gaining new footholds in North or South America. The United States would certainly prevent any foreign naval base being established off Nicaragua, as it would be a perpetual menace to its own security and a constant source of friction. It is pledged to prevent any such act, and would be supported not only by our own people, but the other governments, which have found the doctrine a protection and not a menace to their independence.

Madriz would in the end suffer from the establishment of a foreign Power at his doors. Constant friction between factions would leave the door open for the Power so established to step in on the request of one or the other parties involved, and the results would not be favorable to Nicaragua. Madriz will have to think again and see if he cannot devise something else to keep himself in power. Meanwhile our government may decide that the carnival of blood has gone on long enough and insist that it shall cease.

The Lure of the Air

DEATH is taking a heavy toll among the aviators. Those who would ride the air must be prepared to face perils that are even more appalling than the dangers that befall by land and sea. It was a cynic who said that "war was the game of kings, business the game of men and love the game of fools." He might have added that aviation is the game of those that hold life lightly. Although a mere handful of men have entered the aerial lists thus far in three years, thirty-two have given up their lives in the struggle, twelve of them being victims of the aeroplane and twenty of the gas-inflated balloon. Lightning was responsible for three of the disasters, explosions for two more, fire claimed one and the others were caused by storms, treacherous wind-currents and accidents to driving mechanism. But real enthusiasm disdains danger, and the conquest of the air will go on, although many more sacrifices may be expected ere it is finally won. The lure of fame and fortune, and the sheer love of adventure are things that are irresistible and have been so ever since the human race began.

Mr. Taft as a Legal Reformer

PRESIDENT TAFT, being himself a lawyer of ripe experience, speaks with the voice of authority when he discusses the legal profession. In a recent address to the Northern University of Ohio, he made some very pertinent observations affecting lawyers and the law. He said, substantially, that he regarded it as an abuse in the profession for lawyers to devote themselves so willingly to the defense of criminals—that in this respect the profession was going too far; and he added that ma of the faults that are now found with the admini tration of justice had their origin in this abus While the President did not say so in specific term he clearly implied that the best talent of the profe sion was too readily at the service of those who cou afford to pay well for it, regardless of the ethic aspect of the case. Of the truth and timeliness this observation any one who has noted the pr cedure in recent bribery cases in certain States competent to judge. In New York State, it is n torious that the ablest talent in the country retained wherever an offender of large means brought to book. The result of this condition things is interminable delays and frequently a m carriage of justice. The President further referr to the "awakened moral conscience of the country which he affirmed could find no better object for i influence than in making the lawyers understa that their duty "is only to see that their clien legal rights are protected, and that they need n and ought not to lose their own identity as office of the law in the cause of their clients, and rec lessly resort to every expedient to win the cas This is sound, practical sense from one who, havi sat on the bench, speaks from experience a thorough familiarity with the whole subject.

The Man with a "Grouch"

SOME persons are unfortunate in being born wi a grouch; others acquire one by assiduous cul vation and a few have it apparently thrust up them by sheer force of circumstances. We ha known men who would rather grouch than e They could not see the bright side of anythin there was nothing in which they did not detect so cause of complaint. Such people, by carefully nu ing the disposition to grouch, at last become accustomed to its indulgence that it is like seco nature. The king of all the grouchers passed aw in New Jersey a few days ago. He believed hims to be haunted by misfortune; he lost his farm, l horses and all his property, no doubt largely throu the continued cultivation of a grouchy temperame At last he took to bed, disgusted with life and eve thing else. For thirty-one years, he kept his bed a refused to speak to any one. It was a queer way "getting square" with the world. He would rise night, eat a little, take a walk in the dark and back to bed. He deliberately closed the door again all human kindness and social intercourse; and wh at last this poor unfortunate passed away, he tc his grouch with him, for nobody wanted it. T was an extreme case, of course, and alienists wo have pronounced the man crazy; but from all t records, his afflictions, which were probably of l own making, held no justification for such folly his. Job, the most afflicted man that ever lived, w an optimist in comparison. Grouching is the po est kind of retaliation against conditions that c not be controlled. Let us look on the bright s of things, and whenever we feel disposed to grou let us remember the poor victim of his temperam who nursed his grouch until it killed him.

A Canadian Arctic Expedition

CAPTAIN BERNIER left the other day for his fourth expedition to the Arctic regions on board the Arctic. He sailed under sealed orders from the Canadian government, and it is expected that he will carry the British flag farther north than it has ever been taken and will claim more land for the empire on whose territory the sun never sets. The Arctic was originally known as the Gauss. It was built in Germany in 1901 and carried the Antarctic expedition of 1902-03. It was purchased for the Canadian government by Captain Bernier in 1894 from the government of Germany. It is said to be the strongest ship ever built for navigating icy seas. The walls of the hull are of massive layers of oak capable of withstanding an enormous ice pressure, and in all her experience in the North she has never met with a serious accident of any kind. The expedition carries no dogs or beasts of burden. The sledges are to be drawn by human hands, and the boats are said to have modern improvements of great value. It is not expected that these explorers will undertake to go to the Pole, nor even look for any evidence concerning the work of Captain Peary and Dr. Cook. Captain Bernier went as far north as Etah last year and as far west as Banks Land. The captain has provisions for thirty months, but does not expect to be absent over two years. The chief articles of food will be a large stock of pemmican, oxo, and bovril, biscuits and flour, and some salt pork. Hunters, whalers, sportsmen, and others who may be encountered by Captain Bernier in the course of his expedition will find him armed with the powers of a Dominion game officer and with very strict regulations for the protection of wild life in the far North, especially in the prohibited seasons. He will not allow buffalo or bison to be hunted or killed at any time up to 1912, while he will see that musk oxen are protected between March 20 and October 15, and elk, moose, caribou, mountain sheep and goats from April 1 to July 15, and from October 1 until December 1. Wherever the British flag goes civilization and Christianity go with it, and the planting of the British flag farther north by the Canadian explorers will mean more light and love to the inhabitants, and minister to the expanding British Empire in fulfilling the prophecy that shall usher in the universal kingdom of our Lord.

He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth. (Ps. 72:8.)

Drowned in the Mire

William Elbreck and William Bender of Maspeth, Long Island, started from their home in Maspeth the other evening to a place called Old Mill, where they expected to spend the evening with friends. They took a rowboat at East New York for their destination two miles away. The tide was against them, night came down, and they found themselves in a marsh at the edge of the bay with the water waist-deep. Rather than risk drifting out to sea in the night, they undertook to wade from where the boat was to solid ground about a hundred yards away. Elbreck cried out that he was sinking and that something was holding him fast. Bender, realizing that his companion was a prisoner in the quicksand, avoided his danger and tried his best to relieve his friend. He hunted about for a log, a piece of rope, or anything which he could offer to the hand of his struggling friend, but he could see or feel nothing of the kind. He called to his companion, "Keep up your courage, Bill." He shouted back he would try, but that the job would be very hard. Elbreck cried out in pitiful tones that the water was up to his elbows, and then still more pitifully, "It is up to my armpits. I don't know whether I am sinking or the tide is coming in on me." It was the tide, and his voice was hushed as his companion fell fainting on the grass. The tide receded and in the early morning three fishermen saw the dead man standing like a log marking the channel. They managed to pull him out, placed him in their boat, took him to the shore and sent him to his family. There is deceit and danger and death in the mire of temptation and sin, and the waves of destruction overflow the soul. It was for salvation from this that the Psalmist offered his earnest prayer.

Save me, O God; for the waters are come in unto my soul. I sink in deep mire, where there is no standing: I am come into deep waters, where the floods overflow me. (Ps. 69:1, 2.)

The Tipping Trust

It used to be that the man in the hotel to whom the tip was given kept the money; but the tipping business has taken on the trust proclivity, and very little of the money lingers in the pockets of the man who first receives it. Coat-room privileges in the larger hotels sell from $5,000 to $10,000 per year, and one hotel is reported to have received as high as $50,000 for its combined privileges let to tip collectors. Notwithstanding these high prices paid, the men owning the tip-stands gather in more than $100,000 from the generous guests. The tip privileges for vehicles at the front and side doors of hotels sell at from $1,000 to $10,000 a year. The doorman has a day and night watch and reaps a rich harvest from both. The doorman gets from twenty-five cents to a dollar from each of his wealthy visitors. It is said that a man paid $50,000 a year for the tips for checking garments at one hotel alone. The privilege of the dining-room and restaurant tips are sold at an enormous figure. The individual waiters have to turn what they get in to the head waiter and he to the man that is at the head of the tipping trust. Even the elevator boys have to give their pennies and dimes in to the trust treasury. With scarcely an exception all the head porters of hotels have retired wealthy from the tips which they take from all the under porters. No matter who gets the money, the fee has to find its way to the head porter. The whole tipping business with the underpaid employees receiving the benefit is a habit of questionable propriety, but the habit in behalf of the greedy tipping trust is one of the greatest impositions and abominations of modern times, and a wholesome and righteous public sentiment should soon put an end to it. These getters of gain are pretty well described by the prophet.

Yea, they are greedy dogs which can never have enough: . . . they all look to their own way, and every one for gain, from his quarter. (Isa. 56:11.)

Capt. Bernier of the New Canadian Arctic Expedition and His Sailing Master

Railroads and Rates

The New York World has printed some railroad statistics which will be of interest to our readers. In 1899 it says the total capital stock of American roads was $5,742,000,000; in 1908 it was $7,641,000,000, an increase of $1,900,000,000. In 1899 the bonded debt was $5,644,000,000; in 1908 it was $8,788,000,000, an increase of $3,144,000,000. In ten years more than $5,000,000,000 of additional securities have been issued by the railroads of the United States, and yet with stock enormously watered the roads have within the past few years raised and paid dividends. From 1898 to 1908 railroad mileage increased but 24 per cent., gross earnings 93 per cent., net earnings 85 per cent., interest paid to the real builders and owners of the railroad 57 per cent., and dividends to those who owned and manipulated the stocks 184 per cent. The question is asked why the railroads only of all the public service corporations plead the cost of living, high wages, etc., as an excuse for increasing rates and fares. Street railways are not asking 6 cent fare, telephone companies are not raising their tolls, water rates are being lowered, electric light and power companies offer tempting terms for special industrial purposes, and the chief telegraph company has recently begun to send fifty-word night letters at the ten-word day rate. Why is it that the railroads are the only ones among all these public utilities that insist on the increase of rate? The railroads answer that they have been compelled to increase the wages of the men and that other additional expenses have been incurred. The future has been mortgaged to pay for the fifty and a hundred million dollar terminals in some of the cities and other such expenses, and the people who ride and ship goods will, of course, have to pay the enormous bills. Dissatisfaction with rates and wages is not of modern origin. Jacob makes grievous complaint against the unfairness to him in adjusting the scale of wages when he says:

Thou hast changed my wages ten times. (Gen. 31:41.)

Found His Father

After coming alone from Lunza, Russia, Usher Lefton, five years of age, who was lost by his parents during the massacres four years ago, passed through New York City the other day on his way to Newport, Ky., in search of his father. During the massacres the boy, who was then a baby a little over a year old, got lost from his parents and they were compelled to flee to America, leaving him behind, and, as they supposed, dead. They mourned the little one as a victim of Russian tyranny. But the baby lived and thrived. He was cared for by friends and was lately put aboard the Main of the North German Lloyd with a tag fastened to him indicating his destination. When he arrived at Ellis Island the tag was gone, but the Hebrew Shelter and Aid Society identified the boy and located his father at Newport, Ky., to whom the boy was expressed. Such pathetic stories always recall the sadness of life's separations and the crying out of the heart for loved ones and for the home of the Father. Amidst the scuffles and tragedies of life we get separated to different villages, cities, States or nations, and are lost children hunting our own. After a long journey and the crossing of a sea, we shall find our loved ones and be at home with them forever.

In my Father's house are many mansions. (John 14:2.)

Electric Lights in Tarsus

The ancient city of Tarsus in Asia Minor, where the apostle Paul was born, has recently been illuminated by electricity. Mr. Edward I. Nathan, Consul at Mersine, in a report to our government on the electrification of the ancient city, says that the power is taken from the Cydnus River, upon which Cleopatra once made a trip famed for its magnificence. There are now in Tarsus four hundred and fifty electric street lights and about six hundred incandescent lights for private use. Tarsus in giving Paul to the world furnished a spiritual light for the Gentile nations and the whole world and reflected the light of Christ the central Sun. Simeon as he held the young Babe in his arms magnified the illuminating power of this saving truth:

A light to lighten the Gentiles, and the glory of thy people Israel. (Luke 2:32.)

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

IT was Dr. Klopsch's own idea that the larger the circulation of a paper the richer, as a rule, would be its contents. "If THE CHRISTIAN HERALD had only 100,000 subscribers," he said by way of illustration, "it could not afford to provide such interesting, attractive, edifying and instructive features as it does with its tremendous weekly output of over 300,000 copies. Every subscriber profits by the addition of another subscriber, and when these come at the rate of twenty-five thousand new subscribers yearly, the improvement assumes noticeable proportions. Such has been the history of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD during the past ten years, and hence the wonderful changes for the better that have characterized it from year to year."

Loyal to Its Mission

We know that we are making a good paper and we are glad of it. Started for the sole purpose of disseminating a spiritual truth, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has been true and loyal to its mission, and tens of thousands have been led by its means into the clearer, fuller light that now irradiates their lives and makes the world through them brighter, better and happier. And what THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has done for these tens of thousands it can and will and must do for other hundreds of thousands, perhaps even—and may God grant that it be so—for millions.

Expecting Great Things

We confidently believe that all of our present subscribers are so thoroughly pleased with the paper that they would be glad to see our hopes fully realized. They know the blessed influence THE CHRISTIAN HERALD exerts; for they themselves have felt it. Week after week they have scanned its beautiful pages, have read its inspiring messages, have reveled in its literary and artistic wealth, have been deeply interested, edified and instructed, and, after having read it from beginning to end, have sent it to some distant friends that they also might share its perennial riches.

All Love It

Few papers published are read and re-read as is THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and none affords greater pleasure and delight, or makes warmer or more lasting friends. It is an indisputable fact that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has a larger percentage of renewals than any other paper, and that, from its very beginning, it has retained a larger percentage of permanent subscriptions than any other publication; and its subscription list is constantly increasing. Now what has been done in the past is only an indication of what may be done in the future, provided we all work heartily together with a view to securing the object on which we have now set our hearts.

A Financial Sacrifice

To bring this about we have determined to enlist the cordial co-operation of our friends, and ourselves to make such a financial sacrifice as will demonstrate our own sincerity in the matter. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD cannot be produced at less than its regular subscription price, which is $1.50 per annum. But to interest those who cannot appreciate its beauties, simply because they do not see the paper, we have decided to accept an unlimited number of one-third year trial subscriptions at twenty-five cents each, subject to the easy conditions set forth in the annexed coupons.

Why We Offer It

We could not make this sacrifice but for the experience of the past, that a very large percentage of our subscribers renew, and when they renew they are glad to pay the regular subscription price, because they are satisfied that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is well worth all we ask for it.

Address: Special Coupon Offer,

MID-SUMMER OFFER!

THE achievements of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have never been equaled by any other publication. It has collected and stributed nearly four million dollars in arity. The farmers of Finland, Sweden, orway and Russia, the martyrs of Armenia, e orphans of India, the reconcentrados of uba, the famine sufferers in China, the rescued en of the Bowery, the thousands of waifs from e tenements happy in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD hildren's Home, all rise up and call it blessed. od be thanked for the opportunities and the ivileges which were ours in the past; and may graciously continue to pour out his blessing on THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, its editors and oprietors and its readers, and make us one d all increasingly useful in his service.

The Best Home Paper

But, in addition to these great monumental arities, there is the mission of blessedness d usefulness of the paper itself, which results light, cheer, hope and happiness in the home rcle. And it is this which we now wish to tend. We are engaged in a great Home issionary effort. You can help us. We know u will help us, and thus have part and parcel all the good which, under divine blessing, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD shall accomplish in years to come.

We Look to Our Friends

Let us begin the work of doubling the present number of its subscribers. While this is a great undertaking, an unprecedented task, it is nevertheless an easy one, for it means just one new subscriber for each and every one now on our list. Surely every subscriber can do this, and we believe you will do YOUR share, while we will gladly do everything within our power to help you.

How to Do It

Our plan is as follows: On these two pages you will find six coupons. Please tear them apart at the dotted lines, then distribute them among such of your Church and Sunday School friends as will be likely to subscribe. They will thank you for doing so. Explain to them the beauties, the riches, the great attractiveness of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and urge them to give it a trial. Tell them that Each Coupon Saves One Quarter of a Dollar on this One-third Year subscription, and you will be surprised how quickly they will avail themselves of the exceptional opportunity thus offered.

If six coupons are not enough for your purpose, write us, and we will send you as many more as you may require, absolutely free of all charge. Do not forget, however, that the coupons are good only until August 31, and cannot be received after that date.

Your Opportunity

Or, if you prefer, you may make a regular canvass among your friends and solicit, by mail or in person, their subscription at our regular price—50 cents for four months. Then retain 25 cents from each subscription, and send us a coupon and 25 cents in cash. Thus, while doing good by spreading the glorious influence of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, you are actually benefiting yourself.

Now for Victory!

Whichever plan you adopt, may success attend your efforts. We feel sure that the most active friends in this aggressive campaign will be our present subscribers, who know and appreciate the good THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is doing, and will be glad of this opportunity to encourage the efforts of its editors and proprietors to maintain its high standard as the brightest and best family paper in the wide, wide world.

AWAITS YOUR CO-OPERATION!

THE HOME QUEEN'S REALM

Women in Council

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

TO return to a topic mentioned last week in one of the letters published. The question is pertinent for the consideration of women. In what proportion should a home contribute to charity, to missionary effort and to the support of religion? Many conscientious women decide that they owe the tenth of their income to the Lord's treasury. Where women are in receipt of a regular salary or possessed of independent means there is no reason why they should not thus dedicate a tenth of all they have. Mrs. Russell Sage not long ago told an inquiring reporter that in the days of her youth, when she was a teacher, it was her invariable rule to set aside a tenth of her salary for Christian uses. She has conclusively shown in recent years that she is large hearted and generous and that it is her greatest joy to give liberally to the causes of philanthropy, education and piety. Many women have so small an income that they cannot give anything, much as they would love to, for children must be fed and clothed and educated and households carried on. Among those who read this page there are men and women both who labor hard and long and earn little, carrying at the same time necessary obligations. The point of the letter last week was that a man thoughtlessly contributed a large sum without previously consulting his wife, on whom rested later the entire burden of self-denial which he ought to have shared. The letter which follows shows how this appears in the eyes of a husband who read the statement:

He Made a Mistake "There seems to be an impression abroad that men stand shoulder to shoulder, take each other's part and are seldom ready to criticise each other's acts. Mr. S., whose wife spoke of him last week, in my judgment made a mistake, and I for one do not stand up for him. As an elder in the church and very likely the intimate friend of his pastor, he probably felt that it was up to him to put down a subscription large enough to inspire the rest of the brethren to emulation. So much depends on having a right start that if brother S. had put down ten dollars instead of two hundred there probably would have been a beggarly following. Still, he ought to have consulted Mrs. S. I made it my rule of life when I married thirty years ago to take my wife into my confidence about giving, spending and saving, and the rule has worked well. I never spring a surprise upon her in financial matters. I believe in giving a tenth and whatever else I can as plus to the Lord's work, and my wife agrees with me.

"JACOB W. R."

What We Want "What do I most wish to have discussed in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD? I think I shall divide the matter into two parts. First, let us have all the helps we can about church and home life in country places. Next, tell us of simple, inexpensive ways in which we of the country, who lead isolated lives and work hard, may entertain our friends. D. M. S."

You have mentioned two prolific subjects. To answer them as they should be will occupy space in occasional numbers for the next six months. I ask the farmer's wife and the farmer's daughter to relate practical details of the carrying on of women's work in the church, in villages remote from city conveniences. How do you get up a supper when you cannot call upon a caterer? What course do you take when you have a fair or an old-fashioned concert in prospect? How do you get the men folk to lend a hand when their strength is required in transforming an auditorium into a convenient room for social purposes? How much did your society raise last year and how hard did you women have to work? Where did you send your money? What are you going to do next year? Simple ways of entertaining company will be mentioned from time to time, and anybody who has a good idea to furnish may send it along.

John's Mother and Martha "You ask in a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD how Martha and John's mother could conquer their difficulties. The answer seems to me to be very simple if (and in the if lies the whole secret of success) John's mother would act as if she were in a friend's house an a visit. Her room is her castle, and in it she should be free to do exactly as she wishes—to move the furniture to suit herself, and to receive her special friends there, if she prefers. She should not try to push herself into any household matters that belong solely to her daughter-in-law's sphere, nor find fault with anything on the table, nor join in arguments between her son and his wife. If a mother-in-law could bring herself to lead this independent life, she would not only find her welcome in her daughter-in-law's home a warm one, but she would also find satisfaction in being free herself to lead her own life, and to fill it with many helpful deeds to those around her. Her daughter-in-law would go to her then, of her own accord, for advice, which, if given in a friendly manner, would bring real help. Each would live her own life independent of the other, under the one roof, and yet the two women would find much mutual pleasure and sympathy in the companionship, when they came together. To sum it all up, let them preserve the courtesy of the early days of their acquaintance, and let John's mother never forget that she is guest in her daughter-in-law's house, and let Martha consider John's mother an honored guest, and do for and consider her as she would any stranger beneath her roof.

A Disconsolate Girl "I am a young woman of twenty but I can truthfully say that I have never had any pleasure in my life. I cook three and sometimes four meals a day for a family of twelve, besides washing dishes scrubbing and washing clothes. If I ask to go anywhere there is a fuss. I would like to go and find work in another city, but I know mother will never let me.

M. J."

This young girl plainly has too much to do, and in the daily grind of her life there is too much monotony and too little fun. To cook so many meals for so many people has tired her, and she fancies any change would be a improvement. I wish to say to the dear child: Do not leave home and go to the city, to any city. Stay where you are. Your mother is very likely working beyond her strength, and she does not realize your depression. If I were talking to her I should say: Turn over a new leaf as soon as you can, and cease to make a fuss if your daughter asks permission to go away on a visit.

FRESH-AIR WEEK

After the city's dust and heat,
The noise of the narrow crowded street,
What joy in the big green world to be Part of God's happiest family.
The farmer laughs as the bare-foot throng
Play in the meadow with shout and song.
Sometimes they ride on the fragrant hay
And the cup of their gladness o'erflows the day.

A MASQUERADE

A little old woman before me
Went slowly down the street,
Walking as if aweary
Were her feeble tottering feet.

From under her old poke-bonnet
I caught a glimpse of snow,
And her waving cap-string floated
Like a pennon to and fro.

In the folds of her musty mantle
Sudden her footstep caught,
And I sprang to keep her from falling
With a touch as quick as thought.

When, under the old poke-bonnet,
I saw a winsome face,
Framed in with the flaxen ringlets
Of my wee daughter Grace.

Mantle and cap together
Dropped off at my very feet,
And there stood the little fairy,
Beautiful, blushing, sweet!

Will it be like this, I wonder,
When at last we come to stand
On the golden, gleaming pavement
Of the blessed, blessed land?

Losing the rusty garments
We wore in the years of Time,
Shall our better selves spring backward
Serene in a youth sublime?

Instead of the shapes that hid us,
And made us old and gray,
Shall we get our child-hearts back again
With a brightness that will stay?

I thought—and my little daughter
Slipped her dimpled hand in mine;
"I was only playing," she whispered,
"That I was ninety-nine."

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

A Query "Can any of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers tell me where I can get an old-time hymn book? The kind I refer to is, I think, either an old Baptist or Methodist hymn book. I remember my grandmother having a large leather-backed one without notes, with a hymn in it the first lines of which are:

"There is a happy land,
Far, far away,
Where saints immortal stand
Bright, bright as day.

"When my mother belonged to the old-time Methodist Church South she had a hymn book in which was another hymn which I would like to get. I began:

"How tedious and tasteless the hours,
When Jesus no longer I see.

THE MATE OF THE "WILDFLOWER"

By WILFRED GRENFELL

The Famous Author, Missionary and Explorer

HARRY Lee was six and twenty, and still only a mate. Married, and with two young hostages to fortune, it seemed to him as if he were ready rather six and fifty, for there was not another man in the port of his age and position who was not a master of his own craft. An open-faced, handsome young fisherman, with black enough in his eyes and hair to give one the impression of a touch of Spanish in his blood, his appearance suggested a certain devil-may-care spirit, and some thought that it was this, combined with the memories of some of the mad pranks of his youth, that kept the owners from entrusting their property into his hands.

He was not a native of the seaport, but his taking to the sea had been in answer to the calling of primal instincts. He only knew of his parents that they had "moved to London," where he, a mere slip of a lad, for one of his wild adventures had been pounced upon by the authorities, sent to an industrial school and apprenticed thence to the fisheries. Here there had been a long-drawn fight between the group of boys among whom he found himself and a sordid, money-grubbing master, who, instead of giving employment as captains to those boys coming out of their indentures to him, saved money and wages by sending his vessels to sea with "kippers," who were still "serving their time."

But another factor which militated against his getting a command came to him without his seeking. One time on shore he had been induced by some of his more serious-minded shipmates to join them at an evening service at their small house near the lower end, which went by the name of "the Bethel." There and then that which was hardly even hoped for happened—the man who had been so strenuous for evil proved to have a deeper nature underneath. Harry, careless and thoughtless hitherto, came in contact with the Saviour who sought him, and yielded his whole heart in allegiance to Him. So sudden a change in such a man was naturally soon noised abroad. Indeed, he himself had no desire to hide his light under a bushel. Whatever he did, he did with a will, and let any who liked take exception to if it they chose.

Now a struggle had just begun between the owners and their crews concerning Sunday fishing. The owners argued that, as the vessels were on the fishing grounds, and were not in sight of land or in reach of churches, the men ought to work their big nets on Sundays as on every other day of the week. They claimed the men could pray as well, if they so desired, while their nets were out; and as the vessel cost money on Sunday as well as Monday, and there were many stormy days when men must lie by anyhow, any captain who refused to fish on Sunday should lose his charge of a craft. Some of the stouter-hearted Christians had paid no attention to this order, and had, on coming home from sea, been greeted with a curt dismissal. Lee's position in this, as in other matters, was unequivocal. He would not work on Sunday, and this, together with his well known uncompromising spirit, made it seem even less likely that he would ever get a vessel of his own to command, for he certainly would not accept one on those terms.

His little wife, however, was an optimist, and though it seemed hard that her husband should have just as much to do with the making of good voyages, and just as much work to do as the skipper, and yet should only get half the poundage money and so be unable to buy his boys things like some other people's, yet her smile was unfailing, and she argued it would all come right some day.

And come right it had to. His day came at last. The fleet had been fishing almost on the "Holland coast," early in their voyage, when the skipper of the Wildflower, of which Lee was mate, met with an accident, breaking his thigh, and having to be sent home in the fish-carrier to London. The vessels were doing well at this time, and to take the vessel home, as most men would, and break the voyage, would mean a heavy loss to the owner. So Harry, in his capacity of mate, called the "boys" together and offered to take command of the vessel and go on with the voyage. They agreed, at least until their owner should send them their recall. There was a mission vessel in the fleet at the time, which always carried a spare hand, who could be lent to help out with a vessel that was short-handed for a time, and this the mission boat now agreed to do for Lee. So the "fish-notes" from the Wildflower kept coming regularly in to the owners, and not for weeks did they learn that the injured skipper had died in the hospital and that the good catches the Wildflower was making were the result of the pluck and energy of the new captain.

So word went out to stay in command till the vessel's time for return was up, and a fresh hand was sent out to replace the second mate, who had taken Lee's place as first.

Sailors are apt to be fatalists, and to think little of death. The prevailing idea over the whole incident in the new skipper's mind was simply that God had so ordained it that this should be the chance of his life. He no more questioned that it was the good hand of God upon him than he questioned that such a token of love called specially for every ounce of energy and skill he could put into it, in order that he might prove himself worthy of the trust. So it fell out that however hard it blew, when other men shortened canvas, the Wildflower shook out her topsails, so that she might drag her net the faster. When others "hove to," fearing to risk the towing of their gear, Harry would show his lights for "shooting the net," and, though buried in seas, would still succeed in hauling safely. In this way he was able to have catches to send to empty markets, clamoring for fish. Thus the earnings of the Wildflower stood ahead of the rest of the fleet.

The weeks went swiftly by. At last the eighth week-end marked the time for home; and provisions were short, for the crew was nothing if not hearty. So he bade the admiral and skippers good-by in the morning, that he might be ready to leave with the first fair wind. Even in so short a time as had elapsed he had made great favor with men who love a hard worker and admire a dash of daring with it. There was a great demonstration of rockets and flags, and salvos of guns, when the Wildflower put her helm up and bore away for home.

"'Be ready to drop—to drop!' he shouted"

It was now early in November, and the long dark nights made it dangerous work making the east coast of England for a small sailing vessel, ten times more so than weathering the breezes in deep water, with plenty of sea room. Two long stretches of sand lie off for many miles parallel with the land, and the channels of safety between them are hard enough to find at the best of times, being but poorly marked, while a single mistake is enough to cost all hands their lives.

To make matters worse, it was dense with fog just when the skipper was expecting to pick up the marked buoys on the outermost sands. Together with the fog and sea, the barometer still held threateningly low. By dead reckoning the Wildflower had run her distance by mid-day, and the safety and comfort of home were now only some forty miles distant. To cap it all, there would be the credit of a fine finish to a record voyage if he could drive her right in before the storm broke.

As Harry thought of what that would mean to his "bit of frock," as he called his wife, he felt compelled to take every chance and "let her rip." It was the mate's opinion, too, that, though they had not seen the mark-boat, it would be best to risk it and go ahead. No sooner said than done. At sea the man who hesitates is lost. The born sailor acts intuitively, while the landlubber is philosophizing. It is, however, just as necessary to be cautious at times, and the skipper made concessions so far as now and again to head the weather and take a sounding. To Harry the sand that came up on the lead, "armed," as we call it, with a lump of tallow in the hollow end, spoke almost as plainly as so many signposts to a driver on the land.

By sundown, though without having seen them, they could tell by the lead that they were on the inside of the outer belt of sands. Often near the land the sky clears up so as to render it visible, but this time it deceived them. The heavy wind failed to dispel the darkness, so that nothing, not a wink, could yet be seen of the land, which they had last viewed two months before. Unless they could get a glimpse of something they would be obliged to lay out the gale without sea room and in shoal water. They were now hemmed in between the land and the breakers, running at best great risk. As night settled in the crew were talking in low whispers of the folly of not having kept outside the sand, and the skipper himself was anxious and depressed. At eight bells the vessel was "hove to," to await issues.

Suddenly there came as a flash on Harry's mind the thought, "Now I can do nothing for myself, surely God will stand by me." This, he told me himself, seemed like a voice speaking to him, so that he felt as we always imagine Paul did, when "there stood by me this night One whose I am and whom I serve." Hurriedly the skipper went down into the cabin, got out the chart and fixed it on the table, just exactly as if he could already see land. He "fixed" the small swinging lamp, and laid out the compass and dividers before calling out to the mate on deck to take another sounding.

While this was being done he flung himself on his knees on the cabin floor, and asked "Him who was with them in the boat" for just one sight of the pierhead light. The whole thing took but a minute, and then climbing the gangway ladder, he walked to the compass, ready to take a bearing of the light he felt certain he was going to see.

I have only his word for it, but it happened exactly as he expected. Away over the lee quarter the fog suddenly thinned out, a patch of clear space almost the size of a man's hand opened up, and then the familiar home harbor light shone out clearly and brilliantly for a brief moment. Carefully he took his bearings, and then—just as suddenly—the fog shut in again, and the darkness reigned supreme.

But one glimpse of the home harbor light was enough for Lee at any time, and in an instant the foresail sheet was loosed and the Wildflower was paying off for home.

The skipper had just gone below to lay off the course, and had just penciled the line he would take when the mate called down the companion and, in a voice evidencing no little alarm, shouted, "Skipper, there's some one calling. I heard it plainly."

"Calling out here? Nonsense!" the captain answered. "Put her S. W. Southerly for twenty minutes, then take another sounding."

"Skipper," said the mate, "it was a voice I heard. Come up and listen."

The mate was evidently frightened. So the skipper once more climbed on deck to satisfy him, angry, however, that a single moment should be lost which might make his bearing of the light less valuable. Faintly, but clearly enough to ears trained as were these men's, a human voice came out of the raging blackness from the direction of the breakers on the sands outside them.

It seemed sheer folly to try and do anything. If it were any one alive, nothing could be done till morning now, and no one could live out a night like this on the Scroby sands in winter. Some of the crew, and even the mate, superstitious, were inclined to think it something supernatural, and while they listened and wondered the Wildflower was still scudding before the wind on her new course. Home lay but half an hour distant now. To the young skipper, thinking of his wife and bairns, it meant everything to make the harbor while still he could.

It was with no little surprise, therefore, they suddenly heard him shout, "All hands stand by to 'bout ship."

With a lurch and a heavy yaw, and not without shipping a nasty bulk of water, the stanch little craft once more came head to sea. "Foresail amidship!" "Lash her along!" "Hard down with the helm!" "Every man below but the watch!" were the skipper's rapid orders. He was determined to claw as carefully to windward as he could without inviting destruction. "The Lord had stood by me that night," he told us afterward, "and I was bound to stand by him if I lost the ship."

A whole hour must have passed before the Wildflower had regained the ground lost in a few minutes. To the skipper, taking a hundred chances of being swept overboard as his little vessel worked to windward in that sea, it must have seemed a lifetime. But he got his reward at last. Once more the weird sound came over the noise of the water, the wail of a human voice.

"Foresail a-weather, let her lie dead!" he shouted. "Get a sounding, and see if we can get near enough to make anything out."

"Ten fathoms," was the answer. "If it's a wreck on the bank, she must be nearer us than that would make the bank. We must head off till morning, unless the fog clears."

It was a cruel night for the little vessel, and of incessant watchfulness for her crew, as they headed on and off the bank all night long, trying to keep about the same spot by watching the soundings. Several times during the night great angry combers found their way aboard, any one of which, had it been able to hit the little Wildflower fair and squarely, would have sent all aboard to death.

When daylight at length broke, nothing was to be seen over that watery waste, nor, peer into that exasperating fog as they might, could they see a thing; while the voice had not been heard since midnight.

Precious hours of daylight once more were going by, and even the skipper began to think it something supernatural; when suddenly, as the Wildflower ventured once more as for a last effort nearer to the edge of the bank, there seemed to spring up out of the water, almost alongside of the vessel, looming enormous in that fog, what appeared to be a huge cross, and lashed to it was the body of a young man. The illusion was only momentary. The men recognized it at on as the royal mast and yard of a la ship. The other spars had probal been washed away. There was trace of anything else but this gigan cross. The vision closed as quickly it opened.

And now a still greater difficu presented itself. How, in such a s way, could they ever hope to save th man? A little of that manœuvri that it takes a sailor to accomplish, a then once more the great spar ca into sight. Carefully working windward, the boat was thrown o the side. Three volunteers at or jumped into her, and dropped h slowly down toward the spar. T man had evidently observed the m nœuvre, for he had changed his po tion on the cross and had begun unwrap the lashings that held hi But as, carried on a big sea, the bo drove by, it became quite obvious th by no possible means could they st to get the perishing man into it. Wi the intuitive resourcefulness of sailo however, they sang out to him as th drove by, "Drop into the water as pass next time! Be ready to drop!"

The Wildflower had now paid off a run to leeward of the boat, where s now lay, waiting to pick her up. F Harry had grasped the situation, a was ready to execute it long before t men told him their arrangemen After beating to windward, towi by a long line the small boat, it w once more allowed to drift down t ward the spar. It was a moment intense excitement to all who we actors in this weird drama. But, su enough—as if he were inspired of G —the poor fellow dropped from h perch into the boiling sea just as t boat approached. There was just o chance in a thousand now for his lif and that one he took. Surely it mu have been ordained that that li should be saved, for even as he sa beneath the water the boat flew by a big sea. Even those iron-nerv men held their breath—and then great shout—for the iron grip of th mate had grasped him, and held hi as in a vise. One heave of that brawn arm, and a lad of nineteen lay in th bottom of the Wildflower's boat.

While the little Wildflower head for home, those mere fishermen, tend as women, nursed back to life befo the cabin fire, with blankets and ma sage, and warm tea, the man they ha saved. Eagerly they chafed his limb Joyfully they saw signs of life retur ing. Even before the pierheads wer turned they had learned it was a larg bark that had driven right across th Scroby sands, beaten in her bottor and sunk in deep water. All hand had perished, as the other spars t which they were clinging had, one b one, "gone by board." This poor fe low had seen nothing of the Wildflow when he called. He had just cried ou in his agony, and it had "pleased Go to hear him and deliver him."

When Harry Lee was asked why h "hove too' all that dark, dirty nigh on so small a chance, he replie "Hadn't the Lord just showed he wa standing by me? I heard him plainl say, 'Stand by, Harry; stand by,' so just stood by."

Harry was admiral of the fleet whe last I saw his cheery face. Many "good bag of fish" he has had to than the Lord for since that successful voy age. Many a stormy sea has he bee brought safely through. But he tell me that never did God seem so near t him—so almost visible—as then.

"I suppose it was just when th opening in the fog came He seeme nearest," I said. "No, doctor; no, no then. It was while us stood ther "purring" over that poor lad in th cabin, whose life we'd saved. To thinl that the Lord needs a man like me doctor, to help him—in them simpl ways, too! It makes the Master seem very near; doesn't it, now?"

The Death-Dealing House-Fly

SPEAKING broadly, man has made the house-fly; it has developed along with the human dwelling. Have had no closed-in dwelling places, it is doubtful if the house-fly, as at present constituted, could continue to exist. It thrives simply because we afford it food, and a breeding-place.

It is at this time of the year that the house-fly takes on life for the ensuing summer and autumn; eggs laid last fall are ready to hatch. At first he is only a little worm, wriggling his tiny grub-like form in some incubating pile of filth, usually the manure pile, the outhouse, or the mound of rubbish or garbage in the back yard. In this condition he is easily killed and it should be the duty of every person to kill him on sight. The house-fly could not exist if you are going to eat, leaving the poison for you to swallow.

This does more to spread typhoid fever, cholera infantum and other intestinal diseases than any other cause.

Disease attacks human beings only when they are brought in contact with it. For instance, you cannot get typhoid fever unless you swallow the germs of typhoid, and you do not swallow these germs unless they get on the food you eat or in the liquids you drink, or on the glasses or cups from which you drink. Intestinal diseases are more frequent whenever and wherever flies are most abundant, and they, and not the summer heat, are the active agents of the spread of such diseases. There is special danger when flies drop into such fluid as milk. This forms an ideal culture material for the baecillus. A few germs washed from the body of everything were kept perfectly clean and sanitary. Exterminate the fly-worms, do away with their breeding places, and there will be no flies.

The common house-fly is coming to be known as the "typhoid fly," and when the term becomes universal, greater care will be exercised in protecting the house from his presence. Flies swallow the germs of typhoid in countless millions while feeding on excreta. They spread a thousand times more typhoid germs in their excreta than on their feet.

As soon as the fly comes out of his shell he is full grown and starts out in the world to make a living, and if your home is not clean, he knows it; for the fly can discern an unclean odor for miles. A pleasant-smelling substance —the fragrance of flowers, geraniums, nignonette, lavendar, or any perfumery—will drive them away.

Look closely at the picture of the fly resting on the glass and viewed from below. Look at the feet and observe that each of them is equipped with two claws and two light-colored pads. The fly clings to rough surfaces by means of the claws and to smooth surfaces by a combined action of the claws and pads. The fly's pads are covered with thousands of minute short hairs sticky at the end. There is no suction—merely adhesion. All his grown-up life, the fly has to manage with sticky feet. These are constantly becoming clogged with adhering substances, and this contamination the fly must assiduously remove if his feet are to act properly in supporting him on slippery places. If this contamination is too sticky to rub off, the fly laps it off, and it then passes off through the stomach.

The fly lays her eggs in the manure pile or some other filthy place. All the germs—all the microbes—fasten themselves on the spongy feet. The fly brings them into the house and wipes them off. The fly that you see walking over your food is covered with filth and germs. If there is any dirt in your house, or about your premises, or those of your neighbors, he has just come from it. Watch him, as he stands on the sugar, industriously wiping his feet. He is getting rid of disease germs, rubbing them on the sugar that one fly, may develop into millions within a few hours.

Don't allow flies in your house. Don't buy foodstuffs where flies are tolerated. Don't allow your fruits and confections to be exposed to the swarms of flies. Don't let flies crawl over the baby's mouth and swarm upon the nipple of its nursing bottle. Dispose of waste materials in such a way that the house-fly cannot propagate, for flies breed in horse manure, decaying vegetables, dead animals, and all kinds of filth. Look after the garbage can, see that it is cleaned, sprinkled with lime or kerosene oil, and closely covered. Screen all windows and doors and insist that your grocer, butcher, baker, and every one from whom you buy foodstuffs does the same. Remember that a large percentage of flies breed in the stable. There is more health in a well-screened house than in many a doctor's visit.

Keep flies away from the kitchen. Keep flies out of the dining-room and away from the sick, especially from those ill with contagious diseases. To clear rooms of flies, carbolic acid may be used as follows: Heat a shovel or any similar article and drop thereon twenty drops of carbolic acid. The vapor kills the flies. A cheap and perfectly reliable fly poison, one which is not dangerous to human life, is bichromate of potash in solution. Dissolve one dram, which can be bought at any drug-store, in two ounces of water, and add a little sugar. Put some of this solution in shallow dishes and distribute them about the house. A spoonful of formalin or formaldehyde in a quarter of a pint of water and exposed in the room will be enough to kill all the flies. To quickly clear the room burn pyrethrum powder. This stupefies the flies, when they may be swept up and burned. If there are flies in the dining-room of your hotel, restaurant, or boarding house, complain to the proprietor that the premises are not clean.

The Marks of a Good Watch Case

When men and women buy watches they think of the movement—the "works" as they call it—but rarely of the watch case.

Your jeweler buys watch cases and movements separately and combines them to make a complete watch.

You are particular about the "works" of your watch—you know the maker's name; do you know the name of your watch case? There is room there for adulteration—for low standards—for the cheapening process that creeps in wherever folks pay for anything without knowing about it.

The trade marks illustrated on this page are standard with the fine jewelry trade, and have been for 50 years. They mean absolute integrity in bullion value, in assay, in construction of a watch case.

The Keystone Company was the first to guarantee the wear of gold-filled cases—nowadays the words "guaranteed for 20 years" have become so common that you may find them stamped on a brass case washed with gold. The only real guarantee is the integrity of the maker—the name behind the case.

The marks illustrated on this page are your safeguard; be sure to find them—they are not hard to remember—Keystone for solid gold—Jas. Boss or Crescent for gold filled. Every good jeweler in this country knows the marks and carries the cases. They are made for ladies' or men's watches—plain, engine turned, engraved or enameled—all sizes, all patterns.

Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde At the Telephone

Courteous and considerate co-operation is as essential at the telephone as in the office or home.

In every use of the telephone system, three human factors are brought into action—one at each end, one or both anxious and probably impatient, another at the central office, an expert, at least as intelligent and reliable as the best stenographers or bookkeepers.

For the time being, this central office factor is the personal servant of the other two and is entitled to the same consideration that is naturally given to their regular employees.

Perfect service depends upon the perfect co-ordinate action of all three factors—any one failing, the service suffers. This should never be forgotten.

All attempts to entirely eliminate the personal factor at the central office, to make it a machine, have been unsuccessful. There are times when no mechanism, however ingenious, can take the place of human intelligence.

The marvelous growth of the Bell System has made the use of the telephone universal and the misuse a matter of public concern. Discourtesy on the part of telephone users is only possible when they fail to realize the efficiency of the service. It will cease when they talk over the telephone as they would talk face to face.

India. Education, however, is making inroads upon such a foolish system, and will weaken it still more in the future. Why, if a man touched the coat of another of a different caste it was pollution. It seems foolish to you, and it is. Education is my hope. My," he said, interrupting himself, and fanning vigorously with his felt hat and gazing out at the shore line of upper New York, which seemed to be baking in the sun, "what weather! It is worse than India."

Before sailing for England on the Mauretania, the Gaekwar spent several days in New York seeing the points of interest and consulting with prominent educators. The Gaekwar always gets his information first hand and in India he is known as the "Hunter of Men," so noted is he for seeking good men for the public service. When he cannot get in Baroda men who are capable of filling certain positions he hires Europeans or borrows officials from the British government until a permanent arrangement can be made.

Baroda is one of the richest states in India, and is rapidly growing more prosperous under the Gaekwar's enlightened rule. He has established schools and has made education compulsory. For those who wish to go beyond the primary and grammar grades there are high schools. He has also established a university which is doing remarkable work for higher education. At present his chief desire is to provide training in the trades and mechanic arts and he has made a careful study of what is being done along that line in Japan and America. In all of his interviews he talked of this ambition, which will probably assume concrete form within a short time. His reforms and general desire for the education and uplift of his subjects has made him very popular among his people and he is always enthusiastically welcomed on his return.

The people of Baroda will be surprised when they see his highness's train of automobiles. In one city in which he stopped before reaching New York the agents interested him in American horseless carriages. Unable to decide which was the best he got one of each and machines of every conceivable size and make will be arriving in Baroda for some months to come. But that is only a trifling expense to a man who has an income of a million a month, and will be another object lesson to his people to lift them out of the rut of the centuries.

Christ Our Friend*

IT might almost be said, in an earthly sense, that we are strong in proportion to the number of friends that we have. The poet wrote:

Poor is the friendless master of a world.

Some great man was asked how he came to have this honor, that reward, the other distinction. His simple answer to each and every question was, "I had a friend."

Not that his progress was necessarily due to what is vulgarly called "pull"; but he meant that love for him in the hearts of friends had so glorified his achievements that they had seemed far better than in his modesty he felt that they intrinsically were; and that thus he had been put forward.

One who makes friends for the purpose of mounting on their shoulders to fame and fortune, will fail, and deserves to; but the true and faithful friend must inevitably be helped by those who love him.

It cannot be too strongly impressed upon the young that their first duty in their homes is to prove themselves true friends to the father, mother, brothers and sisters there.

The remark of the poor widow that she mourned her husband because he had been "more like a friend than a husband," is a severe indictment of the ordinary relation existing between the members of a matrimonial firm.

To whom should we be friendly if not to those of our own households? And yet we are often crossest and most indifferent at home. To look after their interests; to speak always gently and lovingly to them and of them; to help them in every possible way—that is practising most truly the noble virtue of friendship. Did not our Lord say, through his great apostle, writing to Timothy, that "kindness should begin at home"? Let us think often of that much-quoted verse of Mrs. Sangster's:

We have careful thought for the stranger,
And smiles for the sometime guest,
But oft for our own
The bitter tone,
Though we love our own the best.
Ah! lip with the curve impatient,
Ah! brow with that look of scorn,
'Twere a cruel fate
Were the night too late
To undo the work of morn.

And if we show ourselves friendly, not quick to take offense, not trying to push our own fortunes to the detriment of others, ever true and unselfish, it is a hard heart that will not be won by such kindness to loving fealty in return.

But even if it is not won, our duty is none the less plain. Christ's instructions are unmistakable. We are to turn the other cheek if we are smitten. We must forgive seventy times seven. We must stand knocking gently at the door of the obstinate heart of our brother, as Christ stands ever knocking at ours until we let him in.

Professor Black has said that "Attention to detail is the secret of success in every sphere of life; and little kindnesses, little acts of considerateness, little appreciations, are all that most of us need to perform, but they are all that are needed to keep a friendship sweet."

Few of us have opportunities to do great things for our friends; while chances to do little things come many times every day.

Especially do chances come often to make little sacrifices, perform small services, for Christ; because what we do for others is really done for him.

He is our best friend, ready to hear our prayers at any moment, having given his life for us, and having bequeathed to us a manual of directions for following him, whereby we may manifest our loyalty.

Let us never prove false to him for a single day or hour.

God's Unfailing Love*

TO the young this phrase has far less meaning than to the older pilgrim. After you have been through the swelling of Jordan, and the mighty floods have compassed you about, and yet you have felt the everlasting arms sustaining you through all—then you begin to understand the unfailing love of God.

It is the afflicted and the prodigal who most keenly feel this unfailing love. Earthly friends often fall away from a man who is unfortunate; but even though he becomes besotted and lost to shame, our God is ever faithful.

Mr. H. Wellington Wood tells of a striking case of the way in which one poor fellow came to realize this great truth.

The son of a leading merchant in a great city became dissipated; gradually disappeared entirely from the church of which he had been a member; became separated from his wife and his two children; and was finally lost sight of by all who had known him in youth.

One cold winter evening Mr. Wood saw a man in the street whose clothing barely sufficed to cover him—a miserable, unmanly wretch, apparently given over to despair. One glance showed him that it was the son of the leading merchant.

"Why are you starving here," he asked, "when Jesus has spread a feast before you and begs you to partake of it?"

The poor fellow burst into tears. As soon as he could control himself he told his pitiful story—he had been deserted by everybody—he could get no work—he had nowhere to lay his head; but this kind word had touched his heart. He would try once more to be a man and a Christian.

For two hours Mr. Wood walked the streets with him, trying to find a lodging, but nobody would take in a man so repulsively dirty. All night he had to walk the streets, but the next morning he was received at the minister's house, a bath and fresh clothing were given him, and he started out on the new life, depending on that love of God which he had so cruelly repudiated and outraged.

It upheld him. His wife and children returned to him. He is now an officer of the church and has won many souls to Christ.

Napoleon said that his empire and those of Alexander, Cæsar and Charlemagne, creations of genius though they were, were still founded only upon force, while that of Jesus was founded upon love. So strongly and durably was this empire established, that although two thousand years had passed since its founder had died, even now millions would die for him.

More still might be said. That empire is growing stronger every day, and the new Laymen's Missionary Movement and the Students' Volunteer Movement indicate that without pause or setback it is destined to wax greater and greater.

Perhaps the unfailing love of God is most fully comprehended when one reads the lives of the great missionaries—Carey, Nott, Judson, Livingston, Armstrong, Thoburn, Taylor, Paton, and scores of others. The incredible hardships they endured—often persecuted almost beyond human endurance, yet facing their trials with a heroism nothing less than sublime—give one an idea, nowhere else so plain, of the supporting power of God's love—never blotted out, never flowing less full and free—his best gift to men. The great army of the apostles and martyrs praise him—all saints and angels praise him for his never-ending love.

WISE WORDS

A Physician on Food

A physician out in Oregon has views about food. He says:

"I have always believed that the duty of the physician does not cease with treating the sick, but that we owe it to humanity to teach them how to protect their health especially by hygienic and dietetic laws.

"With such a feeling as to my duty, I take great pleasure in saying to the public that in my own experience and also from personal observation I have found no food to equal Grape-Nuts, and that I find there is almost no limit to the great benefit this food will bring when used in all cases of sickness and convalescence.

"It is my experience that no physical condition forbids the use of Grape-Nuts. To persons in health there is nothing so nourishing and acceptable to the stomach, especially at breakfast, to start the machinery of the human system on the day's work. In cases of indigestion I know that a complete breakfast can be made of Grape-Nuts and cream, and I think it is necessary not to overload the stomach at the morning meal. I also know the great value of Grape-Nuts when the stomach is too weak to digest other food.

"This is written after an experience of more than 20 years treating all manner of chronic and acute diseases, and the letter is written voluntarily on my part without any request for it.

Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

Following Christ in Youth

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

"SEE the little children loving Jesus," said a little girl looking at a picture of Jesus blessing little children. And in saying so, she was unwittingly throwing a new light on the dear old story revealing the depth of love there is for the Saviour in the heart of the child. A mother was one day showing a picture of Christ blessing little children to her little daughter, Jennie. "If we had been there, I would have pushed you to Jesus," said the mother. "I wouldn't be pushed to Jesus," said Jennie, "I would go myself." Some artists have caught this loving spirit of the child-heart, and have painted most tender and affectionate expressions in the faces of the children. Childhood is the loving time of life, it is easy, it is natural for a child to love. A child who has not a loving nature has been wronged or mistreated by somebody. An unloving child is abnormal. In his plan of salvation, Jesus made loving the start, then doing, then knowing. St. Augustine put it wisely when he said: "We must know earthly things in order to love them, but we must first love heavenly things in order to know them." Because Jesus put loving first, little children can easily be his followers, and they can grow in wisdom as they grow in stature, for so he grew as a child, the grace of God being upon him. A "child-Christian" is not, therefore, a misnomer. Child-Christians can be counted by the hundreds and thousands in this world, and

> Around the throne of God in heaven
> Thousands of children stand;
> Children whose sins are all forgiven,
> A holy, happy band,
> Singing, Glory, glory be to God on high.

Changed Ideals

It was Jesus' coming as a child that brought Godlike childhood to the earth. Until he came, learned and holy men were the ideals of the church, but Jesus set a child in the midst, and said: "Except ye become as a little child ye cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven." By that act Jesus meant to teach us that the loving, trusting, obedient characteristics of children should be found in all adult Christians.

Jesus did not say that a child was a perfect example, but that he had some qualities which all of his followers should possess. Jesus knew that the child whom he set in the midst had other qualities which should not only not be adopted by others, but which should be corrected in the child. Sometimes children show ill-temper, and we call them "cross," but under the same condition we call grown-up people "nervous." Let us call bad things by their right names at all times, and let grown-ups know that they are not expected to emulate the faults of children as well as their virtues, and thus become childish rather than childlike.

Jesus and the Children

On that day when Jesus gathered the little children about him there were some good people, even the apostles, who were displeased because they thought that the mothers bothered Jesus by bringing their children to him. How strangely they misinterpreted their Master! And so there are hinderers of the children in our time. Some people think the children are too young, too thoughtless to become the followers of Jesus. If there were not a lot of such hinderers we should see the church largely composed of child members. And if we should ask the adult members at what age they joined the church, they would all make answer: "When we were children."

That day, only about three months before his crucifixion, Jesus with little children on his lap, and all around him, laid his hands upon them and blessed them. There can be no doubt that as long as they lived, those little ones felt that touch upon their heads. Other little children have felt a loving caress from some godly person. Some ministers were dining with a family where there was a little four-year-old boy named "Willie." The oldest among them laid his hand upon the child's head and said, "Willie will be a minister." Small as he was, the little fellow repeated it to his mother, and a hope sprang up in the mother's heart. The thought took such a hold upon the child that he often "played minister," when he would make a pulpit out of a chair, and a church out of many chairs. Sometimes he invited members of the family to be "the people," but he preached to the chairs with satisfaction, assuming they were filled even if they had no one in them. As the boy grew older he became an ardent student of the Bible, and in his early youth he fully decided to be a minister, and he preached his first real sermon when he was nineteen years of age. He might have become a minister of the Gospel if the hand of the dear old minister had not been laid on his head, but undoubtedly that incident had much to do with the course of his life.

We must not underestimate the impression which the church makes upon young children. Bishop John H. Vincent was born in Tuscaloosa, Ala., and lived there until he was about seven years old. After forty years he returned, and was told that the house which had been his home was still standing. He replied, "I do not wish y one to show it to me, but take me the Methodist Episcopal Church d I can find it myself, so vividly do remember the way in which my rents led me from the home to the urch and back again." And he did d it without the least hesitation.

For the Good of the Parents

A new great picture of Christ essing little children has been inted. The Saviour is represented being in the midst of the little chil- en on earth in their play as well as e host of little ones in heaven above. here is sweet comfort in this picture r the mothers whose "little lambs are sturing on heavenly meads." They e close to Jesus. Nor think God's de- ns in them frustrated because they d not reach maturity on earth. They ve been likened to the delicate lily ork that helped to complete the auty of Solomon's temple.

The Rich Young Ruler

Another phase of young life was nsidered by Jesus shortly after the cident of blessing little children: A ung man came to him asking the estion, "What shall I do to inherit ernal life?" He must have been a ry handsome young man, for it is corded that "Jesus beholding him, ved him" (Mark 10: 21). We would y that he had been "well brought y" because he told Jesus that from e time he was a child he had kept e Commandments. But that was not e way to get to heaven; if any one is be saved by the law, it must be by rfect obedience. He is bound to ep the law every hour, and so he can t count the obedience of one hour ainst the disobedience of another. If breaks the law, his only remedy ust be mercy, forgiveness and atone- ent. That young man had no sense sin.

"One thing thou lackest," said sus to him. What did he lack?

Dr. Lyman Abbott says: "Not right sires; he wished to inherit eternal e. Not a good moral character; all e moral law he had kept from his uth up; he had been an honoring n, an honored citizen, a pure man. t earnestness; he came running to rist. Not reverence; he knelt be- re him. Not humility; he made will- g and public confession of his faith fore the multitude in the open road- y. Not an orthodox belief; if words re creeds no creed could be more thodox than that which he compacted the two words: Good Master. Not humane and tender spirit, for Christ oking on him loved him. But he cked absolute and unquestioning alle- ance; entire and implicit consecra- n; the spirit of the soldier who only asks what the marching orders of the captain are; the spirit of the Master himself, whose prayer was ever 'Thy will, not mine, be done.'"

Jesus said to the young man: "Go sell that which thou hast, and give to the poor." Then the young man turned and went away, not to give away his riches and return to Jesus as his follower. He never came back again. He went away sorrowful. The thought of his heart was: "My passion it is not he, but riches." He did not know it, but Satan was there.

It has been suggested that if the young man had shown a willingness to give up his riches, Jesus would not have required it of him. God called on Abraham to offer as a sacrifice his only son Isaac. And Abraham made the preparations for doing so, even binding his son and laying him upon the altar, and then God called to him from heaven to withhold his hand, and provided a lamb caught in the thicket to be offered instead of Isaac. And so Jesus might have permitted the young man to retain his riches and he might have made a good use of them, if he had shown a willingness to part with them. If Jesus had considered the possession of riches a sin he certainly would not have several times attended feasts given by rich men, neither would he have made suggestions to rich men about inviting the poor to their feasts.

The Needle's Eye

When the rich young man had turned away and left him, Jesus said to those standing by, "It is hard for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven." Jesus did not say that a rich man could not enter into the kingdom of heaven. To enforce his saying he referred to a well-known occurrence: how at night after the great city gate was closed, through which loaded camels were continually passing all day, a small gate within the large gate was left open, that people might pass in as a porter sat at the gate and kept watch. It was possible for a camel to get through that small gate if his load was entirely taken off. It was probably very seldom done. The determination of a rich man "to die poor" through ante-mortem benevolence is to be compared to the unloading of a camel. But a rich man cannot make sure of heaven that way. He must be an obedient, loving follower of the Lord Jesus Christ. That was the ultimatum given to the young man after he should have disposed of his riches.

The sordid, corrupting influence which riches sometimes have on those who possess them is well illustrated in the old Greek fable of King Midas, which was composed as an antidote to the craze for wealth that was at that time overcoming the Greek nation.

Why Advertisements Are Interesting

AST week we spoke of the interesting character of modern advertising. Here is an incident which further illustrates the point:

Some time ago we published an advertisement which described a cer- in manufacturing process. It appeared but once in the columns of THE HRISTIAN HERALD. During the last few weeks we have received several letters om readers who wanted information concerning the process. In each case it as spoken of as an article which had appeared in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN ERALD, showing that these readers remembered the description of the process t as an advertisement but as an editorial description which had appeared in HE CHRISTIAN HERALD. In other words, that advertisement was so interesting at they did not remember it as an advertisement at all.

This is very characteristic of the work of the modern advertising man. dvertisers have long ago realized that if the attention of readers is to be at- acted, they must make their advertisements even more interesting than the ading columns of the paper. And although there exist some people nowadays ho do not approve of the advertising columns of the periodicals which they ad, still the great mass of the people would miss them very much. They are e expression of the advances made in the modern art of merchandising, which aces the purchaser living far from the busy marts of trade on an equal foot- g with the purchaser who is in their midst.

Whenever any of our subscribers is defrauded by an advertiser in THE HRISTIAN HERALD we will make good the claim, provided that the subscriber, ho must be of record, has mentioned THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in writing to the dvertiser, and provided the claim is made to us within two months of the date the appearance of the advertisement.

OUR NEW PATRIOTIC SHRINE

Valley Forge Now Has a Chapel to Mark the Spot Where Washington Knelt in Prayer

A FEW years ago, Valley Forge was one of the most neglected of the nation's historic places. Visitors saw Washington's headquarters and then wandered around aimlessly, regarding with disappointment the rubbish-choked ditches that were pointed out as the entrenchments dug by the patriots of '77. A few vagrant looking sign-boards informed the tourists that the almost obliterated lines were forts, constructed by Washington's soldiers; but the entire camp-ground was rapidly dissolving itself into the scenery, and landmarks were becoming more and more difficult to find.

All this has now been changed. The trenches have been cleared of rubbish, the forts restored, monuments erected, markers placed to show where the men of the various States had their headquarters, and the entire camp fairly bristles with signposts to guide the patriotic visitor.

Most notable of all is the Memorial Chapel and Patriot's Hall, erected on the spot where Washington knelt to ask divine aid for his difficult and seemingly hopeless campaign.

The story is told that, upon one occasion, a farmer in the neighborhood of the desolate camp at Valley Forge observed the commanding general dismount from his horse and disappear within an adjacent grove. Drawing nearer, the awed farmer-patriot beheld Washington kneeling upon the frozen snow, his hat removed, and his face lifted in the reverent attitude of prayer. It is easy to trace the unfaltering patience and determination with which the great man upheld the shivering, starving soldiers who loved him, to his own reliance upon the Source of all strength and wisdom.

The first service was held in the partly built chapel on Washington's birthday, 1905. How the unique memorial has progressed since may be judged from the accompanying photograph made a few days ago.

The "Cloister of the Colonies," which is the most beautiful of the memorials at Valley Forge, forms one of the entrances to the chapel. Each of the thirteen colonies is to be represented by a bay. Donors of bays and the dates of dedication so far are: New Jersey bay, Miss Sarah R. Chew, 1905; Pennsylvania bay, Mr. T. Broom Belfield, 1906; Virginia bay, Mr. George C. Thomas, 1907; Maryland bay, Mr. James E. Mitchell, 1908; Massachusetts bay, Sons of the American Revolution, 1909.

The Memorial Chapel Erected on the Spot Where Washington Knelt in Prayer

Suitable inscriptions describe the purpose of the memorials. The porch door leading into the chapel is the gift of the Colonial Chapter, Daughters of the Revolution. It is one of the handsomest memorials in the country. On the inner side are the arms of the Washingtons and the English families into which they married. On the door is this inscription:

> To the glory of God, our nation's honour and the memory of George Washington, this door is given by Colonial Chapter, Pennsylvania Society, Daughters of the Revolution.

To the right on entering the chapel is the Washington-Sullivan font, of Indiana limestone. On each face of the octagonal bowl are carved the Washington arms and on the angles are shields bearing the Crusader's cross, symbolizing the warfare of the Christian against the powers of evil.

Valley Forge being a place of long and dusty climbs, the visitor lingers long in the grateful coolness of this interesting and picturesque little chapel. Features to be admired are the "Pews of the Patriots," on the base of which are carved either the family arms, the insignia of a patriotic society or the Colonial seal or State arms. Memorial tablets on the walls are placed in memory of patriots who fought under Washington. Adjoining the chapel is a museum of relics of patriot days. Among the most interesting of the relics preserved at Valley Forge is Washington's marquee or sleeping tent. This tent was stored after the war in the garret at Mount Vernon. It was willed to Mrs. Robert E. Lee, the daughter of George Washington Parke Custis, Washington's adopted son. Her husband was afterwards commander-in-chief of the Confederate army, and when the estates were seized the Washington relics were placed on exhibition in the Patent Office by order of Secretary Stanton. The appeal of Mrs. Lee for the return of the relics after the war was not successful and the tent and other relics were removed to the National Museum in 1883. President McKinley's administration gave them back to the Lee family.

In order that the tramping of patriotic feet over the sacred entrenchments shall no longer threaten the demolition of the lines, observation platforms have been erected. By mounting the steps of these, visitors can obtain a much more comprehensive view of the fortifications than by walking over them, and besides are rewarded for the slight effort by splendid views of the surrounding country.

OUR FATHER'S CARE

TEXT—I. Peter 5:7
"Casting all your care upon him, for he careth for you."

WE probably think more of our troubles than of all other subjects put together. And we probably think less clearly and come to less satisfactory conclusions upon this subject than upon all other subjects put together; the reason being that we are so personally identified with the problem, the personal equation is so much in evidence, that we find it impossible to think our way through. So that the more we brood and meditate and mourn, the deeper we find ourselves in the mire of despondency and the less light shines upon the troubled pathway which stretches out before.

I wish to call your earnest attention to this great exhortation of the Apostle Peter addressed to every heart that believes in the Lord Jesus and to every heart that has not yet experienced that wonderful joy. "Casting all your care upon him, for he careth for you."

This Life an Imperfect One

Definition is out of place in a meditation of this kind. But there are one or two facts which we must keep in mind continually, if we are to understand the meaning of our own sorrows and burdens, and if we are to find a way out.

First of all, never forget that there is something wrong with this world in which we live. A man cannot be perfect unless he is in a perfect environment. You may have a stanch ship, and, if you send it out into the wild winds and tempests and tides of the sea, it may be battered to pieces. It cannot remain perfect, unless it has a perfect environment. You may have a perfect man physically, but he will not remain so in this particular world, because there is a vast, grinding, progressive energy at work which drives all living organisms forward upon the flood of time until they weaken, until they lose their grasp upon the source of perfect power and poise and health, and, by and by, are broken and absorbed back into the elements whence they came. No man has perfect knowledge; perfect experience; perfect peace; perfect purity; perfect victory over his life. If you are looking for a perfect man, do not follow further on that particular quest, for you are wasting your time. If you are looking for perfection in your own nature, cease the search at once, for you will never be perfect so long as you are a citizen of an imperfect world. Now, let us accept the fact. Accept it, and make it the basis of your entire philosophy of life. It will remove at one touch a vast proportion of the irritation, disappointment, and gloom that haunts our minds in the presence of conscious imperfection within and evident imperfection without. That is the first thought.

The Divine Responsibility

The second thought is greater still: God accepts responsibility for this world. I love to dwell on that idea. We used to have, a hundred years ago, a philosophy known as deism, in which God was pictured as a wonderful machinist who had perfected a wonderful machine and started it out with that subtle energy known as Force, to run it, and then sat down on his distant throne, separate and distinct from that which he had made. We have passed forever from such a crude philosophy of life. To-day we approach more nearly to the truth. This is the world which God has made. He has accepted to the remotest jot and tittle his entire responsibility. He has not left us alone. Not a sparrow falls to the ground without him; not a life-cell in any blade of grass this spring, but will function as it was chosen to do; not a living organism of all the countless myriads, the exhaustless infinitude of breeds that will be poured out upon the world this season; not one of them of infinitesimal degree but will be perfect, so far as anything can be perfect in this imperfect world. He careth for the sparrow. The young lions roar, and seek their food from God. He feeds the ravens. The fish in the paths of the ocean, he knows them every one. The stars in their long journey through infinite space, he watches, he loves, he cares for. Not a tear falleth from your eye but God knoweth it and is ready to transfigure it into a rainbow of hope and promise and peace. He sorrows and rejoices with you. He believes in you; he loves you; he is with you even unto the end of the world. We talk about that notion degrading God.

I could not worship a God who would create a universe and then leave it to its fate; who would be great enough to create this vast machine and make it so perfect in its infinitesimal parts, and then not go with it and see it through. He has done so marvelously in his works of creation and providence, and still more marvelously in his works of redemption and recreation in Christ Jesus, who acknowledged—and it has never been denied throughout large portions of the world—that he was God manifest in the flesh. Remember then in the vision of your personal troubles and perplexities and sorrows that this world is identical with your experiences through all departments, mental, moral, physical, animal, human, vegetable, everywhere those imperfections that haunt and disquiet your spirit are common to every created being; and, secondly, God accepts full responsibility for his own creation and has discharged, and is discharging, that responsibility to the uttermost jot and tittle.

Now, with these two great pillars upon which to build our structure, come to this little passage: "Casting all your cares upon him, for he careth for you."

Life's Troubles and Battles

Take the second phrase first: "He careth for you." The word is just as simple as the word which describes the care of a mother as she fits a garment for her little child, or prepares the food, or watches through the long night hours when the little one is ill, or stands upon the doorstep and sees the young feet passing down the pathway to school or out into the world. "He careth for you." You pass away from your home. You go to your school or college. You get out into this great terrific world of ours, and men do not care much about you. They have troubles of their own. They cannot lie awake at night worrying over you. They have their own difficulties; and you must face your fight and bear your burden and quit yourself like a man. But you can always be sure of one thing, that, if your father and mother are living, they will never have care enough of their own to forget you; and somewhere in the world, when your night is darkest and your way is hardest, you can be absolutely certain that if you should walk up the pathway of your home, you would have the same sympathy and the same love and the same care. It is something like that, that this man is trying to tell us this morning: "Casting all your cares upon him, for he careth for you."

This does not mean that God expects to do it all, for he has created us to be workers together with him. We have recently read a noble utterance upon this point delivered by Mr. Roosevelt before a great university in Paris. I read those words of his with profound gratitude that a man in his particular position and at this particular time could give with such evident sincerity utterance to such thoughts of life. We may not agree with his opinion that life is a swashbuckling affair of fighting, but most of us have our battles. Some may slip through life without the hard knocks that the rest of the world has to take into its bosom. Let us not be too sure. Your turn may come, when the fibre of your manhood may be tested and you have to face the fight and quit yourself like a man. Do not for a moment imagine that when we say God cares for us, he therefore ceases to be God. He will not lift from our shoulders any burden that we can carry for ourselves. He will not unravel for us any problem which it is our function to unravel for ourselves. He will not remove from our path any difficulty which we can remove for ourselves. God loves us, and he would fain see to it that we develop into robust manhood and womanhood by burden-bearing and by overcoming even to the uttermost. He careth for us too much to take from us the discipline and pain of our conscious existence.

The Folly of Foreboding

But the kind of care that is dealt with in this verse is different from that. God bless the men and women who are facing their fight. We do not always get into the newspapers, and if we do we usually get in wrong nowadays. We never perhaps are written down among the heroes and heroines of the world; but we have our burden, our problem; and we go quietly forward and handle it the best way we can every day. God bless all men and women of whom that can truthfully be said. They ar the very salt of the earth, God's aristocracy of tru manhood and womanhood. He would have us bea our burden; he would have us fight our fight. H would not have us lie down and have him carry u for he devises, in his infinite purpose, the glory an joy of communion with us, as we walk and talk wit him by the way. That is not the kind of care tha we must expect to have removed from our pathway

A young man starts in his college course. Wha a misfortune it would be for him, if he could sli through and get his diploma without having earne it! He would have his diploma, but how worthless But there is such a thing as anxious care What shall I call it? Brooding, foreboding. No foresight, as Dr. Maclaren says, but foreboding

Take no anxious thought for to-morrow, the Lor said. He did not for a moment mean that we shoul make no provision for meeting the issues of to morrow. How absurd for a sea captain to allow storm to strike his ship before he shortens sail. I is not that. But it is a fear of the future that i based upon ignorance of the thought of God being with us; that is based upon pride for fear that w should fail. Fear, the chief servant of the devil haunts and dogs the footsteps of men, until we ar worn out, not by our fighting, not by our burden bearing, but by the fear that has been suggested t us by the devil, or somebody else that is very like the devil.

Fear Not for To-morrow

There is no reason for any man to be afraid o to-morrow. To-morrow will come, and will have its own anxieties. But you will get through to-day; you will get through to-morrow; and it is absolutely certain that by and by you will get through all the to-days and to-morrows. Then, why cross the bridges before you come to them, and why invent phantoms with which to scare ourselves? We have real troubles enough, real pains enough, real failures enough, without imagining any.

The command is to cast all care of that kind upon him. If you have done an honest day's work, have put the best ability you have into your business, have been square, have done your best as you knew it, and can truthfully say to yourself: "I could not have done any more," then, my brother, there is nothing more you can do. And you have an absolute right to expect that God will do the rest. If, on the other hand, you have been foolish and slipshod, and indifferent to your opportunities and obligations, you have no right to ask God to come in then and make up for your delinquency. He will not do it. You will have, then, to take into your bosom the result of your own sin; but, in doing so, he leaves us not without hope, for that too, in the alchemy of his love, becomes an influence to lift us up and make us strong in the future to overcome our own inane physical and moral weaknesses.

Learning from Jesus

When we have cares of this kind, we must get rid of them in some way. Sometimes we put them on our friends. I would not discourage that. What is the use of a friend if he cannot help you? There are some troubles that are imaginary, with which we torture ourselves and our friends. I would not recommend that we make this general. But there are other battles that are genuine, when you do your friend the greatest honor in the world by taking him into your confidence. He will stand by you when you need him. You will stand by him if he needs you. That is what I mean by friendship. And I think I learned it from Jesus.

Now, sometimes the people who are friends say "No," as my friends have often said to me. None the less is a friend a friend on that account. But that is not what Peter is telling us. He tells us to cast all our care upon God, and he gives us the reason: Because God cares for us. How shall I do that? Last night I was in a company of gentlemen in this city—cultivated gentlemen—and one of them told us a little story about his own life. He was a lawyer, the son of an Episcopal preacher. His father was very anxious to have him become a minister, but he wanted to be a lawyer. He entered that profession and became successful. He married a little girl who was a member of the Congregational Church. In the city where he lived there was a

AUGUST IN EARNEST

By Rev. J. M. Farrar, D.D.*

VACATION in earnest should be your motto for August. Leave all your school books and school work at home. Leave all your school troubles and all of your other troubles in the cellar. Surely they can get along one month without being nursed in your heart. Leave your bad temper and the temper that is not quite so bad at home. One month without getting angry! Long enough to learn how it feels and not long enough for wings to grow. Leave all self-ish-ness at home. Just try to see how much you can do to make others happy. Find out how many things you can cheerfully give to others, when you want them yourself. Anger, worry, anxiety, irritability, envy, jealousy, leave all in the attic. Ask your older brother or sister to tell you what a hobby is. If you have one leave it at home. Home, home, restful home! There is no place like home for a hobby when you are away on a vacation. Do not put camphor balls in the pockets of these faults. Do not brush them and put them away carefully in a moth bag. Hang them in a dark wardrobe for moth-nests.

IF you will leave these articles at home there will be room in the trunk of your body for something you should take. Count your blessings one by one and take them all with you. If you know how to laugh until your lungs are filled with fresh air and sunshine take it with you.

There is one great comfort that many good people leave at home. This you should take with you. Can you guess what it is? It is your religion. God is everywhere. Religion is a vacation. In it you find the real rest from the burdens and bruises of sin. Take your memory with you and "Remember the Sabbath Day and keep it holy." There are unseen dangers in your pathway and there are more of them in vacation tramps than you will find in any other part of the year. You will need some one to watch over you. "He that keepeth thee will not slumber."

DR. FRANCIS CLARK tells an interesting story of a Junior living in Maine who was out in the woods one day during his vacation with a camera taking photographs of attractive bits of scenery. He came upon the mouth of a little cavern between the rocks, and he said to himself, "I will see what sort of a picture I can get out of that cave," and as it was a dark day he decided to take a "time exposure" instead of a "snap shot." Steadying the camera upon his knee as well as he could at the edge of the cave, he gave the sensitive plate a long, deliberate look at the semi-darkness within. Then he continued his tramp through the woods, and after a few hours returned to his camp.

SEVERAL weeks afterward, when developing his plates, you can imagine his astonishment to see in the picture, in the very centre of the cavern, with arched back and bristling fur, and within springing distance of the spot where he had balanced his camera, a huge Canada lynx, that might easily have torn his eyes out or destroyed his life. And yet he came and went and saw no signs of danger.

How splendid the promise, "He that keepeth thee will not slumber." Almost I can hear you say, "I will not go into the woods alone; surely I know enough to keep out of dark caves." Good for you! But there are some other dangers you may not have thought about. More of the members of my Junior Congregation have been sick during and after vacation than at any other time of the year. Your Children's Pulpit believes that while you should be watchful and careful yet you need to ask God every day and every hour to watch over you and to care for you. There are dangers that even mother does not see. After I tell you a story you can think about unseen and unknown dangers.

A BEAUTIFUL child went to a photographer to sit for a picture. After the sitting, the man retired to examine the plate. He was greatly puzzled upon developing the picture in the chemical bath, by the appearance of a number of dark spots on the face, although not the least trace of blemish could be detected on the face of the child. The next day the explanation came. The spots then became distinctly visible. The child had contracted smallpox, and soon died. The faint yellow spots, before they could be detected by the naked eye, were faithfully portrayed by the searching and pure rays of the sun. The photograph revealed them.

BUT, you say, we will keep away from any one who has smallpox. There is something more dangerous than smallpox, and more difficult to keep away from. What can it be? Evil thoughts are more dangerous than the germs of smallpox, and it is difficult for you to keep away from them. They destroy the soul. The soul is covered with the spots before they show on the face. God sees them, has a photograph of them, before you or your parents know they are there. They may develop while you are asleep. The first spot is on the heart. It is not enough to have a beautiful face; the heart must be pure. During vacation you cannot select companions as carefully as you can at home. "Be not deceived: Evil communications corrupt good manners."

August in earnest! Vacation in earnest! Your whole life in earnest! Guard your life against seen and unseen dangers. Ask God who never slumbers to help you day and night.

* Pastor First Reformed Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. TEXT: "He that keepeth thee will not slumber." Ps. 121:3.

The Value of a Child

ACCORDING to President J. H. Mason Knox, of the Association for the Study and Prevention of Infant Mortality, 280,000 babies under twelve months of age, out of a total infant population of 1,400,000, die every year. About 140,000 of these deaths are preventable, being caused by mal-nutrition, stomach disorders, improper care and feeding. The commercial value of a human life he says is $1,700, but the potential value of a baby's life to the community is greater than that of an adult. He estimates that the total annual loss to the country through this needless sacrifice of the babies is more than $200,000,000. We spend every year some $7,000,000 to spread scientific instruction among farmers and stockraisers in behalf of pigs, cattle and horses, but not a dollar is devoted to the saving of this appalling annual waste of infant life. It really looks as if, despite all the talk and the printed books on the subject, Uncle Sam cares little or nothing for his babies, since he permits the annual waste of infant life to go on without making the slightest effort to check or moderate it. In New York alone, within the radius of its five boroughs, 122,976 babies are born in a year. Of these 5,171 die within a few days or weeks, and 15,976 do not survive their first year. There are about 300,000 babies in the big metropolis between the ages of three and four years. Are they not better worth saving than the cattle, the sheep and the hogs? Sensible laws for the betterment of the conditions of infancy and childhood are needed. Homes should be established for the scientific care of the children of the poor and it should be an important part of the duty of every municipality, great or small, to devote attention to the environments of childhood and to see to it that the baby is not left to live or die after barbarian fashion, but is treated as a human being, a member of the civilized community, with the right to a healthy and a happy childhood, and as one of the greatest, if not the very greatest assets of the nation.

Among the Workers

—MISSIONARY Z. CHARLES BEALS, of Wuhu, China, writes: "I thank you very much for your endorsement of me and my work. I also sincerely appreciate the financial help we are receiving through you, and we praise God because of it. I trust that God will, in a very marked way, make your good paper to be a blessing."

—THE AMERICA INLAND MISSION now has over seventy mission teachers and preachers who labor exclusively in the mountains of Kentucky, Tennessee, North Carolina and Virginia. During twelve years it has built over fifty churches and schoolhouses, including three colleges in the remote mountains, where there were none before.

—MRS. HELEN B. MORGAN, who sent us an appeal lately for reading matter for the old veterans in the Soldiers' Home, at Bath, N. Y., writes us that as there is no fund from which to pay freight on books or papers, all such gifts for the old soldiers should be prepaid by the senders. They may be addressed to Capt. Winfield S. Usher of the Home.

—MISSIONARY WILLIAM C. TERRIL, of the Kambini Mission Station, Inhambane, East Africa, writes: "In the death of Dr. Louis Klopsch, we, here in far-away Inhambane, have lost a true and sympathetic friend. To him many of our Christians here owe the knowledge of sins forgiven. By his pleading in the pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD friends were found and gifts were sent so that the Gospel might be preached to these needy people. Many call his name blessed here, because he made it possible for them to know of the Saviour."

—EVANGELISTS HART AND MAGANN, of Fairbury, Ill., have just closed a very successful union tabernacle campaign in the Pacific Northwest, which is said to be the greatest revival ever held in Portland. Forty-five churches of different denominations united in the meetings. A tabernacle seating 5,000 was erected and often proved too small to hold the throngs. It is estimated that over 110,000 attended the meetings. Over two thousand expressed a desire for salvation and about eight hundred made definite profession.

—CHAPLAIN TINKER of the penitentiary on Blackwell's Island, New York, on Sunday, May 29, was presented with a Bible by the inmates of that institution. The committee of visitors included Rev. Francis T. Brown, Layman Ralph W. Bain, and Charles Stewart Miller. Canon Kimber made the presentation in behalf of the inmates. Several letters and telegrams were read from different officials. Governor Hughes and Mayor Gaynor telegraphed their congratulations. Speeches were made by Commissioner Patrick Whitney, Warden Hayes, Rev. I. W. Beard, Rev. Charles Weeks, Rev. Francis T. Brown, and Layman Ralph W. Bain.

NEW COMMANDER OF THE ARMY

MAJOR-GENERAL LEONARD WOOD has become commander of the American army at the early age of forty-nine. As the age limit for active service in the field is sixty-two, he will have thirteen years in the coveted position of chief of the general staff. He assumed his new duties the first week of July, his headquarters for a time being Governor's Island in New York Harbor. Later he will be in Washington. As most of the generals who have risen to the highest position have been nearer the age limit they have had a comparatively short period in which to carry out their ideas. General Wood will be fortunate in having such an extended period to develop any plans he may have. He is known as a man of ideas, very progressive, and anxious to make our small army as efficient as possible. His interest also extends to the organized militia of the country, which under the recent legislation of Congress has become closely affiliated with the regular forces. Whereas formerly most of the State troops could not be used except for home defense, they can now be ordered for duty anywhere that danger threatens, the State legislators passing new regulations to that effect to conform to the new national regulations.

General Wood was born in Winchester, N. H., in October, 1860. He went to Pierce Academy at Middleboro, Mass. Deciding that he would like to become a physician, he went to the Harvard Medical School in Boston, from which he graduated in 1884. Two years later he was appointed assistant surgeon in the regular army, and immediately went West to what was still the American frontier. Indian troubles were still of frequent occurrence, and it fell to his lot to distinguish himself as a soldier as well as a surgeon before he had worn the blue many months. He was in the campaign of 1886 against the Apache Indians, under the command of Captain Lawton. For distinguished conduct in the presence of the enemy he received the medal of honor from Congress, the American equivalent of the Victoria Cross of the British army.

While on Western service he met Theodore Roosevelt, who was then ranching and hunting on the frontier, and they became fast friends. The active military side of the government service appealed strongly to the surgeon, and when the war with Spain broke out he formed the famous First Volunteer Cavalry, better known as the "Rough Riders." He was commissioned its colonel, and his friend Theodore Roosevelt, then Assistant Secretary of the Navy, was commissioned lieutenant-colonel. Both were used to the life of the plains, and it is an old story now of the way the best horsemen of the ranches and from the East flocked to join the command.

Major-General Leonard Wood

Colonel Wood fought at Las Guasimas and San Juan Hill in Cuba, and for his services was commissioned a brigadier-general within two months after taking the field. In December of 1898 he was up to the grade of major-general of volunteers, and was honorably discharged from the volunteer service in April of the next year. He was immediately commissioned a brigadier-general in the regular army, and in December, 1899, was appointed Military Governor of Cuba. He is often spoken of as the man who cleaned up Cuba. He started a campaign against the unhygienic conditions found in Havana, Santiago and other large cities of the island. He was so successful that yellow fever has never been such a menace to the island since that day.

General Wood remained in command in Cuba until he passed over the government to the new Cuban republic in May, 1902. The next year he was sent to the Philippines as Governor of Moro Province. He was made a major-general in the regular service. The islands were still in a greatly disturbed state, and the American troops were in constant conflict with large numbers of Filipinos, who had taken to the woods and were carrying on a guerrilla warfare of the most desperate character. Gradually our troops cleared out these bands, though suffering severe loss. General Wood commanded in person in the last important battle, where the insurgents were entrenched in a strong position on a hill. Our troops after fighting at long range, stormed the trenches and inflicted a decisive defeat on the enemy. It was one of the most picturesque as well as bloody battles in the Philippines, on account of the positions of the respective forces. Its effect on the minds of the islanders was tremendous.

The General commanded the Division of the Philippines from 1906 to 1908. Recently he has been in command of the Department of the East, with headquarters at New York.

The General Staff has planned the army manœuvres which occur each summer, both regulars and volunteers participating. Until a few years ago our troops had no practice except in small bodies. Now they campaign under conditions such as they would be likely to meet in actual war. Last summer Boston was threatened with attack by one part of the army while another tried to hold the invaders at bay in the same wooded country that was fought over years ago by the warriors of King Philip and the gallant Englishmen under Winslow, Treat and Henchman. This year the manœuvres were held at historic Gettysburg in Pennsylvania.

THE TREASURES OF MADAME BOURSAULT

MAMADE BOURSAULT lived in a quiet little street in Paris, running into one of the main thoroughfares leading toward Montmartre. Her little apartment was on the ground floor and kept in such shining order that it seemed almost desecration to intrude one's dusty boots into its precincts; but a cheery "Entrez vous" made the visitor welcome.

Madame Boursault's Treasures

"I am so lonely here all day," she would say, with a wistful smile, "that it seems good to have some one call, and as for my floor, it can be cleaned up again. Ah," she exclaimed suddenly, glancing out the window, "there goes Madame Hertel with her four beaux enfants, four beautiful children. I would be happy if I had some little fingers here to make it what you call—ah, yes, less 'spotlees.'"

When the caller reached the corner where the quiet and the side street ended at the same time on the road to Montmartre, she looked back and saw Madame Boursault looking with longing eyes after the Hertel children, and she could imagine her saying, as she had often done before, "I would be happy with half as many—a pigeon pair."

One night a few weeks later, just when the lights of Paris were blinking out over the narrow streets, Madame was hurrying home. Suddenly she heard a faint cry. She stopped and listened. There was no stir in the archway at the right where the porter was calmly sleeping, with the wooden substitute for the leg he had lost at Mars-le-Tour sticking out aggressively toward the sidewalk. He was the only living creature in sight, except fleeting glimpses of students and tourists flitting across the end of the street as they made their way toward the cabarets of Montmartre.

Thinking she had deceived herself, she started on again, only to stumble over a basket which at that moment began to give forth sounds which indicated that somewhere within could be found a lusty pair of lungs. Without a moment's hesitation Madame grasped the basket and almost ran in her eagerness to reach the doorway. She placed the basket on the table, its mud-stained sides making the first of what was destined to be a great change in the "spotlees" apartment. She lifted the little bundle and gently removed the woolen blanket which was wound around the child as if it were an Italian bambino. Two wondering brown eyes looked up to hers, and with a cry of joy Madame hugged the child to her heart. Then she laughed hysterically, "I have one-half of my pigeon pair."

With joy she showed the child to Monsieur her husband, who smiled, but with less enthusiasm. "Keep it," said he, "there is enough in the pantry for——"

"For number one?"

"Of what?" exclaimed Monsieur.

"Of the pigeon pair I must have. This one is a treasure; I must have another."

Shortly after, Madame was trundling "number one" along the shady avenue leading from the park, when she met a woman, also pushing a baby carriage, in which there was another little girl. The woman exclaimed over the beauty of Madame Boursault's child. Suddenly she stopped with a look of dismay. "I have left my purse on the park bench. Will you watch my child while I run back for it?"

Madame did, and she watched until the conclusion was forced upon her that she must have found "number two" of the pair she sought.

Nothing dismayed, she took it home and showed to her husband her "second treasure." "Ah, if I only had a boy now, a petit garçon, I would be so happy!" she exclaimed.

"If you will adopt this second 'treasure'," said Monsieur in some alarm, "do so; but if you find any more I am afraid we shall be too rich; besides, you wanted a 'pigeon pair.' We will do all we can for these, but I beg of you not to start a dove-cote."

"We shall see," said Madame, gazing in rapture at the two girls.

"Which means that there will be three," said Monsieur, not unkindly. "I am no longer head of my own house."

"No," said Madame, glancing up brightly, "for the children rule the world."

IN THE LAND OF THE PATRIARCHS

Drawing Water from an Ancient Well Near Beersheba

A Wilderness Sheik

By DR. MASON P. YOUNG, Assiut, Egypt

IN visiting most places of historical interest, the traveler often fails entirely to see the scene of its early setting. This is not true, however, of Palestine. On account of climatic conditions, we are safe in assuming that conditions now are very much the same as in olden times. Because of this, in addition to the exhaustive work done by the archæologists, the details of the life of the early patriarchs stand out in wonderful clearness.

In early days, Palestine was indeed a land flowing with milk and honey. Mountain goats still roam over the hills, feeding upon the scanty vegetation, and the bees, like those on Hymettus, are still famous for their honey-making qualities. Not in comparison with our rich lands of to-day could Palestine have been called a fertile country. Cultivation was never very extensive, and it was only possible by bringing soil up to the rocky hills with slow and painful labor.

A Native Threshing Board

Although small in extent, it was a country of two-fold character. On the north stood the Lebanons with the small but fertile tracts of Palestine scattered around in rich profusion, and along the coast lay a long stretch of splendid harbors. On the south were the barren and secluded hills of Judea, with nothing to prompt its inhabitants to enter into the life of the world. We therefore find a diversity of conditions. Its people were partly mountaineers, active, patriotic and poor, with a tendency to asceticism; partly a nation of sailors and merchants, industrious, wealthy and luxurious, with no sense of country or unity and accounting riches the supreme end of life. On the one hand it gave to the world its first lessons in maritime exploration and trade; and on the other, it has been the religious teacher of mankind.

The children of Israel could not maintain their national existence; hence they chose the more secluded hills of Judea. It was a compact state, with no level plain to defend and no outlying territories to protect. Its capital stood high upon the mountains, strongly fortified by nature and difficult of access. While Galilee fell hopelessly and easily before the armies of Assyria, Jerusalem witnessed the fall of Nineveh itself.

Seeing that the patriarchs chose the dry hills of Judea, it is not surprising that the few historical incidents of their lives are always mentioned as occurring around the wells of water. It has always been around these wells, surrounded by their broad margins of smooth stone, that have occurred whatever signs of animation or civilization the neighborhood afforded. They were the scenes of the earliest contentions of the shepherd-patriarchs with the inhabitants, the places of meeting with the women, who came down to draw water from their rocky depths; of Eleazar with Rebecca, of Jacob with Rachel, of Moses with Zipporah, of Christ with the woman of Samaria. What they were ages ago in each of these respects, they are still. The shepherds may still be seen leading their flocks of sheep and goats to their margins; the women still come with their pitchers and talk to those who "sit by the well," and the traveler still looks forward to it as his resting-place for the night.

From both Galilee and Samaria on the north and Judea on the south, the geographical position of Palestine has aided its people. Situated midway between the ancient empires of the Oriental world, it was at once the meeting-place between the civilizations of Egypt and Babylon. Long before Abram migrated to Canaan, it had been deeply interpenetrated by Babylonian culture and religious ideas. The trade of the world passed through it, and met in it. It was destined by nature to be a land of commerce and trade.

Palestine was essentially formed to be the appropriator and carrier of the ideas of others, not to be itself their originator and creator. The religion of Israel came from the wilderness, from the heights of Sinai and the palm-groves of Kadesh; but it was in Palestine that it took shape and developed, until in the fulness of time the Messiah was born.

It was amid one of the early Assyrian pilgrimages that Abram turned his face towards Canaan. In this he saw the guidance of God, as he was led toward the land that the Lord would show him. In his journeyings, he followed in the wake of the caravans that were constantly passing to and fro. At his first stop in Haran, he was still in the midst of the influences of his own country, and even in Canaan he was not beyond the reach of Babylonian life. Babylonian armies had already penetrated to the Mediterranean, Palestine had been included within the bounds of her empire and already her culture and religion had spread widely among the Canaanitish tribes.

It was not, therefore, to an unexplored empire that Abram migrated. The laws and manners to which he had been accustomed, the writings and literature which he had learned in the schools of Ur, the religious beliefs among which he had lived in Chaldea and Haran he found again in Canaan. As he adapted himself to circumstances in his new home, he adopted many of the religious rites of the Babylonians and the Canaanites. Out of these grew many practices that, even in the new dispensation, met the approval of the Master. The giving of the tithe had long been practised in Abram's old home; there the large temples to the moon-god were kept up by this income. Also, in his offering up of Isaac, he was making the same sacrifice that the Assyrians made as they once a year offered up that which was dearest to them. In the midst of these surroundings he realized that a fuller revelation was to be given than had ever been received by man, and with a childlike dependence he waited patiently for the fulfilment of the promises, as "he looked for a city that hath foundation, whose builder and maker is God."

China's Anti-Foreign Agitation

FAMINE again threatens China. Foodstuffs are held in many parts of the empire at prices that are unapproachable for the average Chinese. Coincident with these distressing conditions, there come to us from various missionary sources reports of serious anti-foreign disturbances and rioting. One of our missionary friends in Suchien, Kiangsu (one of the group of eastern provinces affected by the last great famine), writes that there has been an active anti-foreign propaganda this year throughout the whole country. As prices soared, the riotous portion of the populace seized the opportunity to loot and burn. "Dozens of churches in central China have suffered," he writes. "Here, in North Kiangsu, the new large roller flour mill was burned and dozens of rich men were robbed; but here the foreigner and the Christian churches were left alone. We were mere spectators, while thousands rushed here and there for loot. We missionaries were safe, the people said, because we had helped them in the two previous famine years. They would not be aroused to do us an injury. Among the human agencies which established this good feeling we gladly acknowledge THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its generous readers. . . . When we saw the cabled announcement that Dr. Klopsch had passed over, many Chinese and all the missionaries in North Kiangsu felt that they had sustained a deep personal loss. He was faithful to us, and thousands of orphans and poor children are growing up to bless his memory. Only eternity can show what a work for God and his fellow men Dr. Klopsch was enabled to do." What a superb testimony to unselfish devotion and to united Christian effort! In the present time of trial and danger, the influence of what has been accomplished in China through the instrumentality of Dr. Klopsch and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, operates as a bulwark of defense for the mission workers, bringing blessing and safety. We trust that they may be kept under divine protection and that the peril may soon be past.

Lowering the Walls

THIS is an age of federation and in no field is the tendency toward union more pronounced than among the Christian churches. First, the note of a united faith was sounded by the representative congress of laymen in Chicago, and it found a generous response. The great Missionary World Conference lately held in Edinburgh, Scotland, emphasized it by appealing for a practical working union of the forces in heathen lands and at home. A still more recent evidence of the growing strength of the movement for Christian union is found in the organization in New York, only a few days ago, of the Christian Unity Foundation, which numbers among its leaders several of the most earnest and able churchmen and laymen in America. Its announced object is:

To promote Christian unity at home and throughout the world; to gather and disseminate accurate information relative to the faith and works of all Christian bodies; to set forth the great danger of our unhappy divisions and the waste of spiritual energy due thereto; to devise and suggest practical methods of co-operation, substituting comity for rivalry in the propagation of the common faith; to bring together all who are laboring in the same field, and this in the belief that full knowledge of one another will emphasize our mutual membership in the one body of Christ and our common agreement in the essentials of faith.

This new movement, if conducted in the true spirit of Christian brotherhood, cannot fail to be fruitful of great and beneficent results. If controlled by a few leading churches, it will not meet the emergency. It is not necessary to raze ruthlessly the walls of separation that now divide the different orders of Christianity; but as that broad-minded and optimistic Christian, Rowland Hill, once remarked, "These walls need to be lowered, so that we may shake hands a little easier over them." Like each separate State in our Union, every denomination has its own special interests, and these, where they do not antagonize the interests of the whole, can be respected; but on all vital truths and all measures of practical service for the advancement of Christ's kingdom, there should be, and there can be, absolute unity. So much has been lost by disunion in the past that every right-thinking man and woman will welcome these new evidences of the growing tendency toward real Christian federation, which is not to be brought about by any efforts at control by rich and influential churches, but by the exercise of that spirit of the Master who said: "And they shall become one flock, one shepherd."

Where Mr. Roosevelt Failed

MR. ROOSEVELT has confessed that in one line of activity he has failed. The announcement that our strenuous ex-President has failed in anything which has the word activity in the same sentence will come with a shock of surprise to many people, and they will, from the "milk of human kindness" which is supposed to be in the possession of the most of us, even while the other kind is retailing at nine cents, extend a warm new thought-wave of sympathy toward Oyster Bay and encourage him to try again. Mr. Roosevelt says he can not milk a cow. He has tried, but finding that he had not the skill, or the drawing power, as it were, he now leaves it to the hired man at Sagamore Hill.

With deep reluctance and at the risk of giving the insurgents some new campaign material, we will give the main facts. The Colonel said that when he was ranching in North Dakota, they got tired of condensed milk which was extracted from a herd of Jersey tin cans three times a day. With cattle, cattle "everywhere and not a drop to drink," it seemed ridiculous that a supply of the fresh lacteal fluid should not be forthcoming. The cordial "come boss" of the future President proving of no avail, Mr. Roosevelt chased the cow two miles, caught it with a lariat, threw it, roped it, turned it upside down, and tried to milk it; "but," says he, sadly, "I got precious little milk." Evidently the gravity of the situation was too much for the cow, or maybe the cow being inverted the gravity of the earth was too much for the milk. At any rate the whole situation was too much for the gravity of the bystanders, and Mr. Roosevelt ceased from troubling, and the producer of natural milkshakes was at rest. We are sorry that Mr. Roosevelt did not try again, for thus getting into close contact with the original producer, he could decide better whether it was getting all of the profit it was really entitled to, or whether the milk trust has still some excuse for dealing in any way with watered stock.

Such, in brief, is the story of Mr. Roosevelt's only recorded failure where animals are concerned.

Science Gone Astray

HAECKEL, the famous German scientist-skeptic, has issued a new ultimatum concerning immortality, in which he says: "The human person, like every other many-celled individual, is but a passing phenomenon of organic life. With its death, the series of its vital activities ceases entirely, just as it began." For a scientist, this is not scientific, and shows that Haeckel's powers of argument are declining. He affirms in substance that what may lie beyond human sense or vision does not exist. The reasoning is about as conclusive as that of the grub in the well-known story, which believed, with all the other grubs at the bottom of the pond, that there was no world beyond the little mud realm of grub vision. It could not dream of the glorious transformation that awaited the grubs that were taken up to the surface where they exchanged their outer husk for glittering wings and lived in a new world. It will be remembered that some time ago Haeckel's teachings were repudiated by a number of professors who denounced his methods as unscientific and untrustworthy.

A Noble Gift to Missions

THERE is a joy in doing the Lord's work—in helping forward, by ever so little, the cause of his kingdom on earth—that can never be realized by those who give themselves mainly to worldly pleasures. Among the readers of this journal there is a very considerable number who know this from personal experience. They have practised "spending themselves" for others, and they have the inward happiness that comes from divine co-operation and approval. Never is one the poorer for such gifts, but always the richer, for they multiply themselves under divine blessing and their influence reaches out far beyond our reckoning. A subscriber in Illin wrote us lately that he desired to give a sum $1,500 to foreign missions, where it could be used advantage "in aiding schools, institutions, hospit and urgent needs," and "where it would do the m good and be the most lasting." After full cons eration of the wishes of the donor, this splendid g was apportioned with his approval as follows:

Mrs. Elizabeth F. Brewster, Hinghua, China	$100
Miss Susan E. Haswell, Moulmein, Burma	100
Rev. Frederick Jansen, Cebu, Philippines	100
Rev. W. Hagqvist, Kienchow, Shensi, China	100
Rev. Z. Charles Beals, Wuhu, China	100
Rev. J. M. L. Harrow, Cape Palmas, Liberia, Africa	50
Mrs. Lee, Calcutta, India	50
Mrs. May Winsor, Sirur, Poona, India	50
Rev. J. McC. Seig, Luebo, Congo, Africa	50
Rev. H. O. Howard, Kolahpur, India	50
Rev. J. M. Springer, Old Umtali, Rhodesia, Africa	50
Rev. M. Klein, Akashi, Japan	50
Rev. R. H. Bender, San Salvador, C. A.	50
Rev. Mr. Bach, Maracaibo, Venezuela	50
Rev. Geo. N. Thomssen, Bapatla, India	50
New Hebrides Mission, founded by Rev. John Paton	50
Mary Reed Leper Mission, Chandag, India	50
Rev. E. H. Richards, Inhambane, East Africa	50
Rev. R. Wodehouse, Umtali, Rhodesia	50
Rev. N. F. Hoijer, Russian Evangelical Mission	50
Rev. Nicolas Zamorra, Manila, P. I.	50
Rev. H. W. Schwartz, Sendai, Japan	50
Rev. Wilfred Grenfell, Labrador Mission	50
Jerusalem Leper Mission, Jerusalem, Syria	50
Dutch Leper Mission, Surinam, Dutch Guiana, S. A.	50
Total	$1,500

Checks for the above amounts have been fo warded to each of the missionaries named in t list. These men and women are faithful, tried wor ers in many different mission fields, where su substantial help will be most welcome. From all them the donor will learn, by and by, of the rece tion of his gift, and he will also know something the toils and sacrifices and self-denials that alwa go with such lives, and to which we, who live Christian lands, are strangers. May his examp awaken in others a desire for similar service.

This is som what indefinite, but it is more than probable that there is so supplementary understanding which has not been disclosed. Ju how it will affect the question of China's rights and the "op door" of equal commercial privileges to other Powers is a matter f speculation. China has published a note on the Convention, expres ing satisfaction that it upholds the Portsmouth Treaty and t "open door" principle in Manchuria.

—TWENTY YOUNG girls, students in a physical culture inst tute at Loftus, Germany, telegraphed Emperor William a fe weeks ago, asking permission to visit him and to present hi with some flowers when his yacht, the Hohenzollern, was in t neighborhood. William replied courteously, inviting them tea. When they came they brought a quantity of chocola and enjoyed the visit greatly. After the departure of t yacht, the Emperor telegraphed a message to the young ladi which must have pleased them immensely. This is a transl tion of the Emperor's message, which was written in vers "You who with us your chocolate drank, fair maidens, one a all, we thank; and wish your lives as sweet may seem as sugar chocolate crowned with cream."

Albanians Surrender to Turks

ALBANIA is a province in the west of European Turkey, extending from Montenegro in the north to the Gulf of Arta in the south, and rom the Adriatic to the Shardagh. Two hundred ears before Christ it became a Roman province; the Middle Ages it fell under the power of the lav; when the Turks came into Europe the Alanians fought desperately for their independence rom 1443 to 1467, but in 1478 the Turks were vicorious and most of the time since then it has been nder the rule of Turkey. A million and a half of berty-loving people occupy this territory of Alania. They have recently rebelled against the uthority of the Turkish government, and have iven the home government great anxiety, but the ebellion has just been successfully quelled by a trong force under the command of Shevket Turgot 'asha. In the villages through which the victorious eneral passed the Albanians in their picturesque ative costume came out and offered to the comander-in-chief a bowl of milk in token of their ubmission to the superior force of the 'urkish troops. Turkey with her twin evils of slavery and polygamy has made poor mother government for her tribes, nd disintegration and decay have been anifested in almost every portion of he empire. It is to be seen whether here is virtue enough and fondness of iberty enough amongst the new generaion to adjust itself to the rights of the eople and the laws of eternal justice. t is to be hoped that the people will nore and more be allowed their rights nd that the butcheries and oppressions hat have blackened Turkish history may e a thing of the past. Peace in the lace of war is in harmony with the igns of the times and the teachings of ur Christian religion. Peace after conlict is recorded in many places in the ld Testament Scriptures.

And when all the kings that were servants to Hadarezer saw that they were smitten before Israel, hey made peace with Israel, and served them. (II. Sam. 10:19.)

Gold and Silver Table

Nemise Ventura, of Porto Rico, spent most of thirty years making a table out of silver and gold. He was a miner and conceived the idea of depositing the precious metals in the form of this table. The legs are of gold, the top is of silver. Around the edge of the table are designs of ancient coins; the centre part represents a map of the United States, all being outlined in silver. The table is twelve inches in height, sixteen inches long, and ten inches wide. The maker estimates its value at $60,000. He is in New York City now, hoping to dispose of his prize, but he is so afraid that some one will steal it that he scarcely leaves it for a moment. He desires very much to witness the sights of New York, but says he will not run any risk of his table getting away from him. This man has manifested great skill and industry, and it is to be hoped his thirty years of labor will be rewarded with a generous purchaser. The world is full of gold and silver tables that so hold men down that they cannot get much time or opportunity to see anything else or do anything beside keeping thieves away from their gathered riches. The real treasures of life are the things that thieves cannot steal. Like the man watching his table, men's hearts are where their possessions are.

For where your treasure is, there will your heart be also. (Matt. 6:21.)

Smashing False Measures

Many hundreds of measures, from the pint up to the bushel, were destroyed on the pavement of City Hall Park, New York, while crowds of citizens gathered to witness the work of destruction. Scores and even hundreds of weighing machines which had defrauded customers were smashed to pieces and were carted to the Battery, where they were dumped on a police launch. The fragments of the measures and weights will be taken down the bay and dumped overboard. This destruction was by order of the Commissioner of Weights and Measures. There has been an alarmingly frequent use of false weights and measures discovered by the detectives who have made raids into almost every department of trade. The measures are never found to be too large, nor the weights giving more than is due; always light weight and short measure the lying devices that have been the instruments that respectable thieves have employed. No one could have imagined that this fraud on the consumer could have been practised to so general a degree, and it is a matter of encouragement to the friends of public morals that these abominations are discovered and opposed.

Divers weights are an abomination unto the Lord; and a false balance is not good. (Prov. 20:23.)

Imprisoned in a Car

Some boys and girls from a poor district in Buffalo were playing about some empty cars standing on the track. The boys said to two of the girls, as they pointed at a refrigerator car, that they would find some nice fresh bananas in that car, if they would go into it. They walked into the car and in an instant the boys, in fun, closed the door and ran away. The girls hammered on the door and screamed for help, but none came. In a little while the car was jammed and then started on its journey. The girls were crazy with fright and screamed in vain. One of the little girls cried all the time and the other prayed every waking minute. There was one knot-hole in the car out of which they could see when daylight and dark came on, and through which they secured air enough to prevent their suffocation. These girls were imprisoned from Tuesday until Friday, without a bite to eat or a drop of water to drink, and they were only discovered after an alarm had been sent out from the homes of the girls in Buffalo and the little boys owned up to what they had done, and the car was diligently sought and located and the little ones rescued in an exhausted and almost insensible condition. It would hardly be thought that children could be so brutalized as to be guilty of such a thing. The boys that run the streets of the city and hang around the freight yards of railroads take vice in at every breath they breathe, and the little girls themselves were over the danger line when they were loafing about these tough places. It is not the fault of the children at all, but of the parents, many of whom are besotted with rum and every conceivable vice, others of whom are correct in their lives, but are so pressed down in the struggle of life that they do not take proper care of their offspring. The ostrich lays her eggs and leaves the young to the motherhood of the sands. That kind of nurture for children fills penitentiaries and electrical chairs. People rich or poor, high or low, good or bad, living in the crowded city or in the country place, should remember that children who are allowed to run the streets or hang around the freight yards and such places, are bound, sooner or later, to get into trouble of some kind or another, like the two rascals who locked the girls in the car and the poor little creatures whose trip came so near being a fatal ride.

The rod and reproof give wisdom: but a child left to himself bringeth his mother to shame. (Prov. 29:15.)

Albanians Giving Milk to Turkish Officers, in Token of Surrender

Record-Breaking Cow

Josephine, the prize cow of the State College of Agriculture of Missouri, has a margin over the world's record for six months of 1,204 pounds, or about 150 gallons. Josephine holds the world's record for milk production for one day, one month and four months, taking all these places from Colantes Forth Johanna, of Rosendale, Wis. Josephine produced in one month 2,960 pounds against the previous record of 2,783 pounds. Her record for milk in one day is 110.2 pounds against the previous record of 106 pounds. The cow has never figured very much in the records of the pen or songs of poetry of the nations, and yet if the generations that have owed so much of their life to her could speak their words of praise, no other creature would be half so popular. The prize cow reminds us of the plentiful supply of milk promised by the prophet.

And it shall come to pass in that day, that a man shall nourish a young cow and two sheep; and it shall come to pass, for the abundance of milk that they shall give, he shall eat butter. (Isa. 7:21.)

Back to the Farm

Governor Hadley of Missouri, and others, have been working for some time upon a practical plan for the emigration of people from the city to the farm. The plan is to organize a National Farm Homes Association, with the philanthropists of the country as stockholders, to furnish farms, equipment, and instruction for worthy applicants who are seeking to escape from the cities. The movement includes ideas similar to those in practical use in Europe, with a few minor additions. It is proposed to incorporate the association for a million dollars, the stock to be divided into one thousand shares of $1,000 each. These shares it is expected will pay dividends, which will either be taken out by the stockholders or added to the capital. It is proposed to locate colonies on model farms in Texas, Missouri, Alabama and other States where the land is cheap and fertile. Each farmer will be allotted forty acres; a home will be erected for him, and fences, utensils, and live stock furnished. Thirty-two of these forty-acre farms will constitute a colony. Each colony will include a central farm, with an expert agriculturist as the superintendent to oversee the work, arrange the proper rotation of crops, etc. Tenants will be given ample time to pay for their farms, whose profits Governor Hadley calculates will be more than $3,000 a year. Entertainment will be provided for the colonists so that farm life will lose the dull monotony that has driven so many of the young from the country to the city. The disproportion of supply to the demand for food products, which is having so much to do in causing and increasing the cost of living, will compel the movement back to the farm. The cheapening of electricity, the multiplication of the conveniences of life, and the natural attractions of the country will entice many from the crowded cities to the ample farms. This plan of Governor Hadley seems to be in the right direction and it is to be hoped that with its proposition of philanthropy and business thrift combined it ought to be successful, and help in the solution of the important problem which really perplexes the country at the present time. The race for its support has to get back close to nature, has to get down close to the ground, the source of physical sustenance.

While the earth remaineth, seedtime and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night shall not cease. (Gen. 8:22.)

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

IT was Dr. Klopsch's own idea that the larger the circulation of a paper the richer, as a rule, would be its contents. "If THE CHRISTIAN HERALD had only 100,000 subscribers," he said by way of illustration, "it could not afford to provide such interesting, attractive, edifying and instructive features as it does with its tremendous weekly output of over 300,000 copies. Every subscriber profits by the addition of another subscriber, and when these come at the rate of twenty-five thousand new subscribers yearly, the improvement assumes noticeable proportions. Such has been the history of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD during the past ten years, and hence the wonderful changes for the better that have characterized it from year to year."

Loyal to Its Mission

We know that we are making a good paper and we are glad of it. Started for the sole purpose of disseminating a spiritual truth, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has been true and loyal to its mission, and tens of thousands have been led by its means into the clearer, fuller light that now irradiates their lives and makes the world through them brighter, better and happier. And what THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has done for these tens of thousands it can and will and must do for other hundreds of thousands, perhaps even—and may God grant that it be so—for millions.

Expecting Great Things

We confidently believe that all of our present subscribers are so thoroughly pleased with the paper that they would be glad to see our hopes fully realized. They know the blessed influence THE CHRISTIAN HERALD exerts; for they themselves have felt it. Week after week they have scanned its beautiful pages, have read its inspiring messages, have reveled in its literary and artistic wealth, have been deeply interested, edified and instructed, and, after having read it from beginning to end, have sent it to some distant friends that they also might share its perennial riches.

All Love It

Few papers published are read and re-read as is THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and none affords greater pleasure and delight, or makes warmer or more lasting friends. It is an indisputable fact that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has a larger percentage of renewals than any other paper, and that, from its very beginning, it has retained a larger percentage of permanent subscriptions than any other publication; and its subscription list is constantly increasing. Now what has been done in the past is only an indication of what may be done in the future, provided we all work heartily together with a view to securing the object on which we have now set our hearts.

A Financial Sacrifice

To bring this about we have determined to enlist the cordial co-operation of our friends, and ourselves to make such a financial sacrifice as will demonstrate our own sincerity in the matter. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD cannot be produced at less than its regular subscription price, which is $1.50 per annum. But to interest those who cannot appreciate its beauties, simply because they do not see the paper, we have decided to accept an unlimited number of one-third year trial subscriptions at twenty-five cents each, subject to the easy conditions set forth in the annexed coupons.

Why We Offer It

We could not make this sacrifice but for the experience of the past, that a very large percentage of our subscribers renew, and when they renew they are glad to pay the regular subscription price, because they are satisfied that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is well worth what we ask for it.

MID-SUMMER OFFER!

THE achievements of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have never been equaled by any other publication. It has collected and distributed nearly four million dollars in charity. The farmers of Finland, Sweden, Norway and Russia, the martyrs of Armenia, the orphans of India, the reconcentrados of Cuba, the famine sufferers in China, the rescued men of the Bowery, the thousands of waifs from the tenements happy in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home, all rise up and call it blessed. God be thanked for the opportunities and the privileges which were ours in the past; and may He graciously continue to pour out his blessing upon THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, its editors and proprietors and its readers, and make us one and all increasingly useful in his service.

The Best Home Paper

But, in addition to these great monumental charities, there is the mission of blessedness and usefulness of the paper itself, which results in light, cheer, hope and happiness in the home circle. And it is this which we now wish to extend. We are engaged in a great Home Missionary effort. You can help us. We know you will help us, and thus have part and parcel in all the good which, under divine blessing, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD shall accomplish in years to come.

We Look to Our Friends

Let us begin the work of doubling the present number of its subscribers. While this is a great undertaking, an unprecedented task, it is nevertheless an easy one, for it means just one new subscriber for each and every one now on our list. Surely every subscriber can do this, and we believe you will do YOUR share, while we will gladly do everything within our power to help you.

How to Do It

Our plan is as follows: On these two pages you will find six coupons. Please tear them apart at the dotted lines, then distribute them among such of your Church and Sunday School friends as will be likely to subscribe. They will thank you for doing so. Explain to them the beauties, the riches, the great attractiveness of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and urge them to give it a trial. Tell them that Each Coupon Saves One Quarter of a Dollar on this One-third Year subscription, and you will be surprised how quickly they will avail themselves of the exceptional opportunity thus offered.

If six coupons are not enough for your purpose, write us, and we will send you as many more as you may require, absolutely free of all charge. Do not forget, however, that the coupons are good only until August 31, and cannot be received after that date.

Your Opportunity

Or, if you prefer, you may make a regular canvass among your friends and solicit, by mail or in person, their subscription at our regular price—50 cents for four months. Then retain 25 cents from each subscription, and send us a coupon and 25 cents in cash. Thus, while doing good by spreading the glorious influence of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, you are actually benefiting yourself.

Now for Victory!

Whichever plan you adopt, may success attend your efforts. We feel sure that the most active friends in this aggressive campaign will be our present subscribers, who know and appreciate the good THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is doing, and will be glad of this opportunity to encourage the efforts of its editors and proprietors to maintain its high standard as the brightest and best family paper in the wide, wide world.

AWAITS YOUR CO-OPERATION!

Resolve to Act At Once!

DO not feel hampered by lack of material. If you have more friends who want to subscribe than you have coupons let us know, and we will send you more free of charge. Do not forget that no name will be accepted for a subscription which is now on our books.

OFFER NUMBER TWO

Hero Tales FREE!

To every person who sends us six coupon subscriptions terminating December 1, 1910, accompanied by twenty-five cents each, we will send, all charges prepaid, and absolutely free of all expense, a volume of Hero Tales, printed in large clear type, 400 pages bound in Red and Gold. Just think of it! Sitting down at your fireside with Heroes of War, Heroes of Peace, Heroes of Conscience, Heroes of Science, meeting them practically face to face in your own home! A wonderful book!

FURTHER INDUCEMENT

To the first thousand persons sending us six coupons, together with 25 cents for each subscription to the One-Third Year Offer of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, we will send, absolutely free, in addition to Hero Tales, a copy of The Wedding Ring, by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage. So act at once, and win this Special Book Prize Free.

CHATS ON MY COOL VERANDA

Women in Council

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

DURING the summer, the woman who wants to be comfortable spends all the time she can out of doors. If she has a veranda she invites the neighbors to drop in and have a sociable chat there instead of in the coziest inside living-room. This is the season for loafing. The wise woman indulges herself in laziness, if possible, when the mercury mounts into the nineties. I say, if possible, because there is always a pretty large if to be considered when the house-mother is on the lookout for her individual rest and comfort. She it is who so unselfishly plans for the family from morning until night that in many cases they take her goodness for granted and accept what she does for them very much as they do the blessings of the sky. The sunshine comes, the rain falls, the birds sing in the tree-tops, the corn ripens, the flowers bloom, and the brooks run sparkling to the sea. This is in the order of nature, which is the order of Providence. Few of us remember day by day to be grateful to the great Giver.

In a similar fashion we are ungrateful too often to the dear mother-heart that pours itself out in loving self-denial for us. This is a digression. Returning to the matter in hand, the woman who is not engaged in cooking dinners for a house full of summer boarders, who is not responsible three times a day for the meals of hungry farm hands and hired men working in the harvest fields, who has not small boys to engineer through the summer days, or invalids to care for, the woman, in brief, who possesses a portion of leisure may invite her friends to hold their councils on the veranda. Happily, there are enough of us who are thus fortunate. More of us might be could we persuade ourselves to simplify our living. In the summer time it is a good plan to put away out of sight in a bureau drawer the pretty nicknacks that are to be dusted, the photographs, vases, statuettes and the general litter of bric-a-brac precious in feminine eyes. What we should secure, if we can, is a breathing space and a little freedom from the bondage of routine. With this preface let us see the contributions our friends have made this week to our symposium and exchange of ideas.

A Long and Happy Married Life This is a record which it is an especial pleasure to publish:

"My wife and I, on June 3, 1910, celebrated the fifty-fourth anniversary of our happy married life. We were married in Connecticut in 1856, and thanks to a kind Providence, both Mrs. Weaver and myself are in the enjoyment of good health. We have been blessed with four children, but one, a sweet girl of eighteen years, passed over to the better land in October, 1891. All of my wife's family are gone; all of my own but one sister, who will be eighty-five this summer. I have but one aunt left, a dear old lady who is ninety-five in July.

"Waterford, Conn. H. C. WEAVER."

Hints for the Care of Animals "Those who keep dogs, cats or poultry should provide for them plenty of fresh water in clean vessels of agate, iron or china. When fish is fed to an animal the bones should be carefully taken out. A cat should not be left to get its own living when a house is closed for the summer. It is more merciful skilfully to chloroform a pet cat or kitten than to leave it to starve and become a tramp during the hot weather. Few people understand that poultry suffer by neglect. They need water and shade, frequent change of food and the run of short grass. It is too late this season to plant morning glories over the shelters which save hens and chickens from the glaring sun; but erections of boards, though not so pretty, serve the same purpose. The places where poultry live should be kept clean. The little creatures generously aid us in our diet, and they deserve and repay the best of care. M. C. J."

A Lonely Sister "Well, ladies, may I come in? I have never been here before, so I am a little bashful. I have seen a letter of a lonely life. I do not think any one can be more lonely than I am. I cannot hear, so I am lonely in a crowd. I live in a house with two other women. I have my room to myself, do my own cooking and other work. I cannot go in society, nor does any one come to me except on business. I cannot go to church. I am very lonely. A letter from a CHRISTIAN HERALD friend would be a God-send and a blessing. MRS. CATHERINE KEIL.

"Walhalla, Calif."

A Recipe for Pot-pourri "Will you kindly give me a recipe for making a rose-jar?

"M. A. K."

The recipe which follows is taken from Marion Harland's Complete Cook Book and may be preserved for another season, if too late for use this year:

"Gather rose petals when the roses are in their richest bloom, but not when the dew is on them, and pack in a jar in layers two inches deep, sprinkling about two tablespoonfuls of fine, dry salt upon each layer. Continue this until the jar is full, adding fresh petals and salt daily. Keep in a dark, cool place. A week after the last relay is gathered turn out the salted petals upon a broad platter, mix and toss together until the mass is loosened. Then incorporate thoroughly with the formula given below; pack in a clean jar, cover lightly and set away to 'ripen.' It will be ready for rose-jars, etc., in a fortnight, and, if kept covered, will be good and fragrant for twenty years.

"Formula: Violet powder, one-half ounce; orris root, one ounce; rose powder, one-half ounce; heliotrope powder, one-half ounce; mace, one-half teaspoonful; cinnamon, one-quarter teaspoonful; cloves, one-half teaspoonful; oil of roses, four drops; oil chiris, ten drops; oil melisse, twenty drops; oil eucalyptus, twenty drops; bergamot, ten drops; alcohol, two drachms."

In the Retrospect A letter among those which came to this page recently touched a tender chord in my heart. The writer, a husband and father, told this intensely mournful story of calamity:

"I am fifty-five years old. I have been married twenty-nine years. Fifteen years ago last February our house burned, and our youngest girl, six years old, was burned up. April 26 following, another came to take her place. One year from the next November our second girl was drowned on her way to school, and the next February our youngest child died in her mother's arms. All this happened in less than two years.'

One wonders whence the strength comes to bear up under such accumulated disaster, and yet this good man writes confidently that his trust in God has not wavered. His wife and he are together looking upward and he bids all discouraged ones to be of good cheer, and lean upon the will of God.

A Daughter's Room A girl's own room should be the expression of her individuality. To have a room pretty and attractive it is not necessary that a great deal of money should be spent. Simple furniture, including a desk in which she may keep her stationery and where she may write her letters, a book-shelf or two for the accommodation of her favorite volumes, a rocking chair by a window, a bed and a bureau and the essentials of the room are complete. The little personal touches such as the photographs of her friends, a framed engraving, a vase, a small statuette, a work-box or basket, will be added one by one. Allow me to sit a half hour in a girl's room when she is not there and I will feel acquainted with her and will be able to tell what manner of girl she is. If careless and untidy, her room will reveal her character; if thoughtful and intellectual, her books will bear testimony to those qualities of heart and brain; if restless and unsatisfied vague as this may seem to be, a girl's room will tell the story of her moods and yearnings. It is worth while to make the daughter's room a retreat which she will love, and to which she may invite her friends.

Compensation "I have been thinking a good deal about the friend in Montana, who is grieving at the loss of her cottonwood trees. So far in life it has been my experience that something is given us that makes up for every loss. Her compensation may not have come yet, but she may be sure that it will. A. M. H."

The Three Sons of the Crown Prince of Germany

WHEN the father of these little boys was a baby in long clothes, his picture was taken with that of his father, grandfather and great-grandfather, and the old Emperor William looking at it exclaimed: "Four kings!" The present Kaiser, then the Crown Prince of Germany, is now the grandfather of this interesting trio. His father, called Frederick the Good, had a short life and reign. The children of this royal family are trained in Spartan simplicity and in every homely virtue. The eldest of these little fellows may one day sit on the throne of Germany, but two lives must end before he shall attain that dignity.

GIVING THEIR BEST

BY CHARLES LEE SLEIGHT

I.

THE REV. DR. CLARKE greeted the senior warden cordially, and pulled forward an easy chair.

"In regard to your sermon yester-y," abruptly began Mr. Saunders, rvously passing his hand back and rth over his bald crown.

"Yes," murmured the clergyman, ıxiously.

His only son, Harry, had recently come engaged to the senior warden's ly daughter, and he dreaded any-ing that might lessen the good feel-g existing between their families. esterday after the service his wife ıd said: "My dear, I am afraid you ere too outspoken this morning. You ıow Mr. Saunders is somewhat op-)sed to foreign missions. I do hope won't take umbrage. I hope it on't affect Harry and Ethel. I)pe——"

The current of these "hopeful" rec-lections was broken by the warden's)ice. "I was greatly impressed by hat you said. You proved conclu-vely that money given for foreign issions accomplishes twice as much ı visible results as an equal sum ex-ended right here at home. That ap-eals to me as a business man. If a ıing pays, I go in for it. You said in osing your sermon, 'Give your best) God.' Now, sir, I have a proposi-on to make. You find a young man ho will go out as a foreign mission-ry, and I will pay his salary. What o you say to it?"

"It is most noble, most generous!" xclaimed the relieved clergyman.

"It is merely following your lead," aid the warden. "It is the best I have -money. When you have found the ight sort of a man, let me know, and 'll hand you a check for his first ear's salary and expenses."

The visitor had scarcely gone, when here was another knock, and a voice alled: "Busy, father?"

"Never too busy to see you, Harry," esponded the rector. "Come in, my oy."

Unconsciously in addressing his son e always used a different tone from hat in which he spoke to others. His ife once said to him: "I can tell by he mere sound of your voice when you re talking to Harry."

The young man who entered was trikingly like his father, tall and pare, with clear brown eyes set well part, and firm mouth and chin.

He placed a twenty-dollar gold coin pon the desk, saying: "A contribution or missions, sir."

"Punched—of course!" exclaimed is father.

"That is an outward, visible sign of ts value to its former possessor," re-urned Harry. "It's the lucky piece of Luke Johnson, Mr. Saunders' coach-nan. He just handed it to me, say-ng, 'Marster Ha'y, sah, will you lease to gib dis yere to de Doctah for lem missionyaries, an' 'spress to him lat it's de bes' I got. You needn't say uffin' 'bout it to any one else. Since joined de 'Piscopals I ain't 'customed o talk 'bout my 'ligion.'"

"That sermon of mine seems to have truck home," remarked the rector.

"It struck me most forcibly," said Harry, "especially that phrase, 'Give your best.' I have not been able to get away from it. My best is myself, and I have decided to offer myself for work in the foreign field."

"To do what?" cried his father.

Harry had been slowly pacing to and fro, but the sharp tone in which this query was uttered brought him to a standstill.

"To go out as missionary to Japan, provided the General Board has funds enough to send me."

"Ah! yes, that is a most important proviso," said his father, with a sudden, strange look of craftiness in his eyes. "They are clamoring for men, but there is no money to send them. Suppose the funds are not forthcoming?"

"Then I must stay at home, sir."

His father turned his face from the light, and gazed at a picture over the mantel, but all that he saw was a picture of his home with his boy gone, practically forever.

Suddenly he asked: "What does Ethel say to your plan?"

"I haven't spoken to her about it as yet. I have no fear as to her decision, however."

"No, not if she is permitted to decide for herself, but if the General—

"Can't you say at least, 'Good afternoon'?"

er—I mean, if her mother decides for her?" There was a hopeful note in the rector's tone.

"I have thought over all that, sir, and my mind is made up. If I must go alone, I will go at any rate."

After a brief silence the rector said, in a slightly tremulous tone: "Leave the matter with me for a day or so, and I'll see what can be done."

When he was left alone the rector bowed his face in his hands, and groaned. For years he had been building a castle in Spain, and it had not only seemed real to him, but had actually begun to materialize, and now at a breath it was tumbling into ruins. The castle had been for "the boy" mainly. Everything in fact had been for the boy during the past twenty-five years, until his education had been finished and he had become his father's assistant. In a few years he would retire, and Harry would take his place and carry on his work. When the time of his departure came, it would be Harry's dear hands that would soothe his last moments.

He bowed his head upon the desk, with a great sob.

"It must not be! I can't let him go!"

Suddenly he looked up, awe-struck. He knew that no one was speaking, yet the words seemed audible: "God so loved the world that he gave his only-begotten Son."

The decision rested entirely with himself. Harry could not go without funds. Would it be wrong to get some other young man to send out—a sort of substitute for Harry? Perhaps if he dropped a hint to Mrs. Saunders she could, through her daughter, influence Harry to change his mind. Perhaps Mr. Saunders would withdraw his offer if he knew how matters stood. Ah! that was the thing to do. He would see the warden that very night.

Hurrying to the hall he seized his hat and fairly ran to the warden's house, and was fortunate in finding that gentleman still up, although the hour was late.

"Anything wrong?" asked Mr. Saunders, as he noticed his visitor's perturbed appearance.

"No—yes—let me tell you," panted the rector, and forthwith proceeded to give an account of his interview with Harry.

"Bless my soul!" cried Mr. Saunders, at the conclusion of the narrative. "If Harry goes, Ethel will doubtless go with him."

"Precisely," responded Dr. Clarke. "You see, you are as much concerned as I am."

The warden, anxious and perplexed, rubbed his bald head, saying: "We thought we were giving our best, but we weren't, after all, and so the Almighty steps in and takes our best. He takes your son and my daughter. 'Man proposes, but God disposes.' Dear me! dear me! what a curious tangle it is!"

"But you can easily untangle it," insinuated the clergyman. "Simply withdraw your offer to support a missionary, and Harry can't go, not at present, at any rate. Then we'll hurry up the marriage, and perhaps he'll change his mind."

Mr. Saunders arose, and walking across to a window, raised the shade and peered into the darkness. Presently he wheeled about, and came back to where the rector was sitting.

"Look here, Doctor, you are up in casuistry, or ethics, or whatever it is, more than I am," said he. "Suppose a man came to you, and, without going into any particulars, asked if it were right to take back what one has given to God, what would you answer?"

"No," replied the clergyman, promptly.

"Then that settles it for me," said the warden. "I offered that money to God. It's in the bank now. It's his. I can't take it back. Am I not right?"

"Yes, you are right," replied the other, rising. "That settles it. I'll tell Harry to-morrow that the way is clear for him to go. Good night."

The two men gripped each other's hands a moment, and then the one groped his way out into the night, and the other dropped heavily into a chair.

II.

Mrs. Saunders was a capable woman. Everything that she undertook she did well, but she particularly excelled in managing other people. Her capability displayed in governing her own household had gained for her the nickname of the "General" among her intimate friends. Her husband, it is true, sometimes rebelled against her rule, but Ethel's subjection was notorious, and it was even said that the Reverend Harry had to propose to the mother first, and then to the daughter. It was also said that Mrs. Saunders made the match. Whether she did or not, she was certainly pleased with it, for she looked upon Harry as a rising man, and openly prophesied that he would some day sit in the House of Bishops, and while she knew—and regretted—that Ethel could not sit there with him, it was gratifying to think of her in the future as Mrs. Bishop Clarke.

When the good lady heard from her husband of Harry's purpose to go to Japan as a missionary, she was beside herself with vexation, and lost no time in informing Ethel as to her will.

"It is perfectly absurd for him to give up his fine prospects and bury himself out there, and it is preposterous to think of your going with him," she said. "You must induce him to give up his plan. Don't try to argue with him, and don't antagonize him, or you'll stir up that will of his and nothing will move him. Coax him to stay for your sake. Express sympathy with his views and ideals, and all that sort of thing, but show him what a chance there is for him to do good here, and so on. Whatever you do, child, don't promise to go with him, for never will I give my consent to that!"

Ethel received her mother's advice silently, as usual, and dutifully tried to carry it out when Harry called that afternoon.

Questions and Answers

In forwarding MSS. to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, enclose stamped envelopes for return, if unavailable.

John S., Ukiah, Calif. A gentleman who contemplates spending a year in Palestine for study and observation, speaks no language but English. How far will that militate against the success of his visit?

Many find English sufficient for all practical purposes in traveling abroad, hut one European language should be acquired, if possible. French is the easiest and is the court language of Europe. Most travelers in the East hire dragomen who interpret for them.

E. W., Didsbury, Can. How could Christ be divine and still be tempted in all points like as we are? If he was conscious of a divine origin, he was not on the same plane as humanity.

He was both divine and human. He took upon himself the full measure of humanity and "was in all things as we are," subject to the same pains, privations and temptations—"a man of sorrows." Yet because of his divine nature he could rise above all temptations, "without sin," that is, without yielding. In his human character, he showed us the perfect, sinless man, the model which we might copy, though we could not equal. He could sympathize with us in every temptation, even while he perceived more acutely than we the various forms of temptation. He knew what power was needed to overcome and in his triumph over temptation illustrated to all men how they, too, with his help, might win the victory over sin.

Mrs. E. S. L., Antigo, Wis. Why is it that Count Tolstoi is not exiled or imprisoned for the violent attacks in his works upon the Czar?

It is because of his great fame and his popularity among the people. No one else could say what he does with impunity.

C. W., Nathalie, Va. 1. By what name is the land of Canaan of Israel's time now known? 2. Please explain Matt. 19: 10, 11.

1. It is simply Palestine, a part of the Turkish dominions. 2. Jesus' disciples, not fully apprehending his meaning, said that as he had explained it, marriage was a snare instead of a blessing; but he showed them that while the unmarried state might be the best for some, it was not so for all. 3. To your other question, we would say that if a man be truly converted, he will give up his sins, no matter how dear they have been to him. If he has been guilty of wrong toward another he will endeavor to undo that wrong by all the means at his command. We must not only repent of our sins, but we must quit them and put them behind us. To repent and yet go on sinning is to seek our own spiritual destruction.

A. C. C., Pilot Pt., Tex. When one's mind is persuaded of the need of living a holy life, but one's heart will not yield up its desires, what can be done?

You cannot serve two masters. No tree can bear both good and bad fruit. In other words, it is a case in which there can be no compromise. A pet sin, a besetting weakness would stand between you and holy living, and it should be sacrificed. Pray that you may be given courage and resolution to make complete surrender. Study your Bible, especially the words of Christ and the epistles; pray often; buckle on the whole armor of God (see Eph. 6: 13-17), and fight the evil that is keeping your heart in enmity to God.

Constant Reader, Port Byron, Ill. I have lately lost a beautiful young daughter, the idol of my heart. She was almost a perfect child from her babyhood up and I thanked God many times for giving me such an obedient, gentle little daughter. Now, it seems my whole life is spoiled and that it was wrong to take her from me. Is it a sin against God to feel this way? I try to trust him and yet I find myself praying all the time that she is safe in the heavenly home. I have every reason to believe she was a Christian and yet her little life was so short (she was only fourteen), she had not time to serve the Master much.

There is no sin in giving way to human sorrow under such an affliction as yours, but we do not mourn as those without hope. Our heavenly Father knows what is for the best. Your little one, who passed to the other life so young, will be to you not a mere memory but a very real hostage, drawing you closer to Christ and reminding you by her early departure that we are simply pilgrims here; that this is not our abiding place and that we must not set our affections so deeply on anything here that it would divide the worship we owe to God alone. We can understand your feelings and can sympathize with you from experience. To your other questions we would say, do not let yourself be distracted by questions as to spirits. Trust in God and believe that all things will work for your good if you place your faith in him and his word. (The book you mention is an excellent one.)

C. S., Craig, Mo. Where in the prophets does it say that Christ should be called a Nazarene, as mentioned in Matt. 2: 23?

The most satisfactory explanation of this passage is that it has reference to some lost prophecy or else to tradition of which there is no record now in existence.

L. J. D., Lake City, Fla. What form of religion did the Druids practise in England and Gaul?

It is rather difficult to tell what the Druids believed, because they formed a secret priesthood and their records were given down by word of mouth and never written. It is said that they believed in a supreme god, and many lesser gods corresponding to those of Greece and Rome, and that they also worshiped the sun. They believed in the immortality of the soul. The soul they thought passed at death into other bodies. This was used as an incentive to valor, as death was the entrance to a higher life. They believed also in punishment after death for sins committed during life. They had human sacrifices and foretold events from the convulsive motions of their victims. They reckoned time by nights instead of days, and had a chronological cycle of thirty years. It is probable that they understood hypnotism. They imposed on the belief of the people with many tricks known to the so-called magicians of the day. They held the oak and the mistletoe sacred, and were called "Lords of the Oak."

A. C. G., Wilton, N. H. Who wrote the poem beginning "Tell me, ye winged winds," and where can it be found?

It is by Charles Mackay, and may be found in Schaff & Gilman's Library of Religious Poetry (Funk & Wagnalls) and many other collections.

J. T. D., Sidney, O. 1. Who was Melchizedek? 2. Explain Heb. 5: 6.

1. Melchizedek combined the offices of priest and king in his own person, as was not uncommon in ancient times. He was the priest-king of Salem who greeted Abraham in the valley of Shaveh (after the latter's battle with the five kings) and blessed him and refreshed him. In return Abraham gave him a tenth of all of his spoil. Some Jewish traditionists held that Melchizedek was Shem, the godly son of Noah, who had become the ruler of Canaan. Josephus, the Jewish historian, wrote that "he was a principal person in Canaan of the posterity of Noah, eminent for holiness and justice." 2. This passage means that as Melchizedek's priesthood was an immediate divine institution, without precedent, so that of Christ was also divine and not after the Aaronic priesthood, and neither of the two had predecessor or successor.

D. R., Knoxville, Ia. Please give me the stanza beginning,

"Prayer is the burden of a sigh."

The other lines of this stanza are:

The falling of a tear;
The upward glancing of an eye,
When none but God is near.

A. B. P., McHenry, N. D. Please explain Rom. 9: 13, 15, 17.

This passage (v. 15) explains an act of special and unmerited grace, as when God chose Saul the persecutor, who became Paul the apostle. The three verses emphasize the fact that salvation is God's gift, to grant or to withhold, and which no act of ours can merit, but which comes to us of his own good pleasure. It is our duty, however, to do our part, for both the "running" and the "walking" are essential to a proper attitude; yet, after we have done everything, we must still recognize his sovereign right to grant or to withhold. We are the clay, he is the potter, who can choose one vessel to honor and another to dishonor. But for our comfort we have the oft-repeated divine assurance that no one ever called upon him in vain.

Miss Edna Jane Allen, Owego, N. Y., sends us a cheery little poem on Mont-Lawn, the concluding verse of which says:

"See the joyous little band
On the mountain-side;
Breathing health from azure skies,
Gath'ring wildwood blossoms fair,
Twining daisies in their hair,
Chasing golden butterflies,
What a turning of life's tide
For God's little waifs—his children—
Fed and cared for by his hand!"

Subscriber, Prairie Point, Mich. What is the meaning of Eccles. 9: 5?

That the living, knowing the certainty of death, and having the opportunity still before them, may "number their days and apply their hearts to wisdom," Prov. 7: 1-4. The dead are no more cognizant of worldly affairs, no there any door of repentance and hope ope them, as there is to the living. The pas has no special reference to spiritual things, to persons and things in this world.

S. M. H., Racine, Wis. What is the mea of the third verse of the ninetieth Psa We do not understand the language, "Thou turnest man to destruction, and est, return, ye children of men."

"To destruction" here should be interpr as being crushed or disintegrated, and the clause explains this further, viz.: "Return children of men," i. e., to your original st (See Ps. 104: 29.) The passage you quote reference solely to man's mortality and this terpretation is emphasized in v. 4, which sh how brief a span is man's life in the eyes of eternal Creator.

H. S. R., Seattle, Wash. What were the du of the Quæstor in ancient Rome?

The Quæstor was the public treasurer. also entitled the holder of the office to a sea the Senate. It was the first office open to common people. At first there were t Cæsar raised the number to forty.

L. T. P., Prosser, Wash. 1. Please exp Rev. 22: 1, 18, 19. Does it not include whole of the Bible as speaking of " book"? 2. Why is Revelation so m neglected in churches and Sunday Scho

1. No; it refers to Revelation only and t which the writer has set down concerning holy city and the tree of life. In the begin (Rev. 1: 3) a blessing is promised to the dient student, and at the close, the irrever who would add to or take from the book, denounced. 2. Doubtless because of the d culty of interpretation. It is a book to unc stand which one must not only be a r scholar, but he must also be filled with spirit of Christ.

Popular Protest in Madrid Against Vatican Interference in Spain

FOR several weeks it looked as if the Spanish Government would be compelled to sever official connection with the Roman Catholic Church. The Liberal Premier, the King, who is also a man of liberal ideas, and the cabinet have felt that they must regulate by decree the status of the religious orders, and also authorize the display of religious emblems on places of worship of churches of other faiths. The Vatican objected and fomented opposition to the government. It was feared that the church would incite some of the workmen to open revolt, and demonstrations were frequent. July 21 the Prime Minister announced that the Vatican was willing to negotiate on the basis of State control.

We have received several letters from distan States commenting on our remarks on the r port of the Special Grand Jury relative the White Slave traffic investigation. Some the writers consider that an attempt has bee made to conceal the real facts, in other wor to "whitewash" the metropolis. This impre sion is the result of the widely published sens tional stories which represented New York a frightful den of wickedness, a modern Baby lon, where the forces of evil held undispute sway. Now, nothing could be further fro the fact. New York is, as Judge O'Sullivan declared, the cleanest of all the great cities, an we believe it is constantly getting cleane Much has been done in the last two decades i the interest of public morals. That vice exists however, is unquestionable—our article recog nizes this—but not in the awful, organize form suggested by the sensational reports re ferred to, whose author was forced to confes their untruthfulness and injustice. It is, un fortunately, an easy matter to slander a com munity; and we consider that Judge O'Sulli van's characterization of the attempt was wel merited. Such evils as do really exist are bad enough, but it can serve no good purpose t exaggerate them out of all recognition. Wha New York needs more than anything else is genuine revival of the old Moody type, that wil shake Manhattan Island to its centre and giv it a thorough moral cleansing.

Signs of the Gospel Day*

SOME Bible students find evidence sufficient to convince them that the Gospel day foretold in Joel and in John is already here. Others search out passages to indicate that it is still far distant.

It is enough for us to know that the Holy Spirit, the Comforter, has come. It is the whispering of this heaven-sent counselor in our hearts which impels us to every good work.

In one sense it is true that the remarkable inventions of this age are due to dreams and to visions, such as Joel describes. In the minds of thousands of men and women at this moment strange new devices are shaping themselves for the advance of the race, physically, mentally or morally. Every such device which elevates humanity is no doubt directly inspired from above and we should fall on our knees and thank God for it.

When in such cases the thought becomes clear, there is still the patient labor of practical experiment to undergo before the complete realization is reached. Read the story of the evolution of the steam engine, the telegraph, the automobile, and see how many trials had to be made before practicable results were obtained. Yet the ideal was fairly clear from the first in the minds of the ingenious men who were working at these marvelous inventions. Perhaps the life of Palissy, the great potter, presents as interesting an instance of this kind as history contains.

But the greatest vision of all concerns the moral regeneration of mankind. In order to work out this mighty dream, the saints and prophets and martyrs have shed their blood throughout the ages.

"Where there is no vision," said the inspired seer, "the people perish."

There must be among us men of light and leading, men of force and intelligence, in whose hearts dwells the Comforter, reproving of sin and impelling to righteousness, and picturing a blessed millennium, before the mass of men can be dragged upward.

What are the characteristics which distinguish these men of vision? How may we fit ourselves to move among them—perhaps to become like them?

The great scholar and preacher, Dr. George Adam Smith, says that such a man must first possess the power of forming an ideal. He must study the divine instructions until the features of the true servant of God become plain to him. Then he must strive to possess them and lovingly and skilfully try to help his fellow-beings to become like this ideal.

Dr. Smith divides the powers which constitute prophetic vision into three: first, the power of forming the ideal; second, the power to penetrate the hearts of men, and to see clearly the eternal difference between right and wrong; and third, the intuition of God's will, the perception of the line which he will take in any given set of circumstances.

Such was the vision of the prophet of old, and such is the vision of the true leader of to-day.

Perhaps Dr. Holland gave us as good a description as any in modern times, of these "men of vision" in his stirring lines, "God Give Us Men":

God give us men. The time demands
Strong minds, great hearts and willing hands:
Men whom the lust of office does not kill;
Men whom the spoils of office cannot buy:
Men who possess opinions and a will;
Men who have honor; men who will not lie;
Men who can stand before a demagogue [ing;
And shame his treacherous flatteries without wink-
Tall men, sun-crowned, who live above the fog
In public duty and in private thinking!
For while the rabble with their thumbworn creeds,
Their large professions and their little deeds
Mingle in selfish strife, lo! Freedom weeps,
Wrong rules the land, and waiting Justice sleeps.

* Topic of the Epworth League for Sunday, August 14. TEXTS: Joel 2:28-32; John 16:7-15.

God's Plans for Us*

ALMOST everything about life is mysterious; but perhaps the greatest mystery of all is the wonderful harmony between foreordination and free will.

It is impossible for most of us to conceive of an all-wise being who does not hold within his knowledge, as a necessary part of his age-long plan, every event in the future.

For it is impossible, from a human point of view, that God should not have a great, perfect scheme which he follows in his actions—a scheme with a purpose toward which all events are tending.

This being so, every minute detail of our lives must have been arranged from eternity, and must be known to our Maker. And yet—incomprehensible as it seems—of our own volition we shape our destiny and perform our life-task.

"Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling, for it is God which worketh in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure."

This singular condition has lured many into fatalism. They have said, "What's the use of my doing anything? My life is all laid out for me. It would be a sinful thing for me to try to interfere with it."

And yet, plausible as this theory sounds, the sinfulness does not lie in that course. It lies in not rousing one's self to the utmost, to examine one's powers, to choose the field in which they can best be employed, and then to apply one's self diligently to the work in hand.

You may ask, "How may I know that I am following God's plan for me?"

It is probably impossible absolutely to know God's will concerning us. But we can all, using the light he has given us, select the work for which we seem best fitted, and do it ardently.

Remember that good work is a form of prayer and of worship.

"Labor is worship!" the robin is singing;
"Labor is worship!" the wild bee is ringing.

And the secular, daily worship of every honest soul should be some form of hard, useful work, as well as the daily outpouring at morning and evening of the commanded prayer and praise.

So important has work come to be in the best philosophy of modern times that Carl Hilty says, "No social problems would exist if all faithfully worked."

"One monster there is in the world," cries Thomas Carlyle; "the idle man. Every being that can live can do something; this let him do. Produce, produce, even if it be the pitifulest infinitesimal fraction of a fraction of a product—produce it in God's name. 'Tis the utmost thou hast in thee. Out with it then. Up! Up! Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might. Work while it is called to-day, for the night cometh, wherein no man can work."

Norman Duncan, in his book, Dr. Grenfell's Parish, tells of meeting an old Newfoundlander who had fished from one harbor for sixty years. He computed that he had put out to sea at least twenty thousand times; that he had often been frozen to the seat of his punt; that he had many times been swept out to sea with the ice packs; that he had weathered hundreds of gales, and that he had been wrecked more times than he could "just mind" at the moment; yet he wished that he could live his life over again.

Dr. Banks, after telling this story, adds, "It is a glorious thing to prosecute one's work with unflinching purpose."

May God give us each a work to do for him and help us so to do it!

In the purchase of bonds the value of a banking firm to a client depends upon the scope and efficiency of the service rendered and the integrity and experience of the house.

The Purchasing Power of Our Clientele frequently absorbs even large issues of bonds between the time this magazine goes to press and is delivered to its readers. For this reason we usually find it impractical to offer specific bonds in this space.

However, we are in position at all times to offer a wide range of safe, marketable bonds yielding from 4 to 6% and we invite inquiry when you have money available for investment.

We believe we can convince you that the steady buying of bonds recommended by this firm is one of the best forms of investment. We are equally confident that nowhere else will you find a more reliable or efficient service.

As to Financial Guarantees

HERE is a letter which we have received from one of our subscribers which contains a point of misinformation to which we cannot too forcibly draw attention. The letter in part is as follows:

"As a result of reading the financial articles which have been appearing in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, I have just purchased some bonds of one of your advertisers, and am very well pleased with the prospect, the more so as I have the advantage of your guarantee and that of the bond house."

Now some time ago we called special attention to the fact that our guarantee should not be applied to financial advertising in the same way as it is applied to the advertisements of merchandise. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD could not guarantee the advertisement of a financial concern in the same way as it might the advertisement of, say, a clothing house. The conditions which surround a financial proposition are of a character as would make such a guarantee practically inoperative.

Protection Against Fraud

In the case of an ordinary commodity it is possible to ascertain whether or not the advertiser or the commodity itself is fraudulent within a very short period, and in order to keep as close a check as possible upon its advertising columns THE CHRISTIAN HERALD insists that all claims be made within two months of the date of the appearance of the advertisement. This condition is a part of its guarantee. Furthermore, the guarantee is meant primarily to protect the subscriber from fraud. An advertiser, during some period of business depression, might fail. His failure might come about honestly enough, that is to say, through no fault of his own, in which case it is manifest that fraud was not responsible for the occurrence. And as in such a circumstance no wrongdoing was intended it would not be fair to hold THE CHRISTIAN HERALD responsible.

But although it is not possible to include financial propositions among our guaranteed advertisements, yet the subscriber is really as well protected as though the financial advertisement were included. In the first place, every financial advertisement is thoroughly investigated before it is admitted to the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Not only is the proposition itself scrutinized and examined, but the integrity of the firm offering it is also taken into account. The financial houses advertising in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have been in existence a number of years. Their very success is due not only to their honesty, but to their judgment, which, indeed, is just as important as personal integrity. A firm might be honest enough, but if it were not well managed failure would result.

Better Than a Guarantee

And so by virtue of this good judgment of the reputable concern the subscriber is protected even more than he would be under a mere guarantee. A guarantee is a protection against loss, but a painstaking investigation is practically an assurance that the proposition which has come forth unsmirched will be profitable.

In the letter quoted above, the subscriber also mentions the "guarantee" of the firm selling the securities, but we are quite sure this is due to a misunderstanding. Some time ago we tried to convey an idea of the great amount of trouble taken by reputable bond houses to assure themselves of the practical worth of each proposition handled by them. We attempted to show in the article that this care on their part practically amounted to a guarantee. We were promptly called to account by several bond houses for using the word guarantee in this sense, or for even suggesting that they guaranteed their securities. One letter read in part as follows:

"Your statement is quite correct except that bond firms whose guarantee would be good for much do not guarantee issues which they sell. They cannot afford to do this owing to the tremendous liability they would be under after a few years. A house like this, of course, does place its reputation back of its offerings, makes thorough investigations, and would travel a long road to prevent its clients from sustaining a loss through default. At the same time the firm does not place itself under a legal guarantee, nor does any other firm within the writer's knowledge. As stated, the paragraph seems to be in strict accord with the facts, except in the matter of a guarantee. Of course, the real situation comes very near amounting to the same thing. Yours very truly,

"N. W. HALSEY & Co.
"H. D. ROBBINS."

Another letter we received was in part as follows:

"We wish to call your attention forcibly to the fact that reputable houses do not and can not guarantee the bonds they sell. Any such guarantee would defeat its own object by making the liabilities of the house so doing far exceed its own assets. We have taken the trouble to call your attention to this matter because such a statement in your periodical would give your readers an entirely erroneous idea of the bond business as it is to-day conducted by reputable houses.

"Yours very truly,
"E. H. ROLLINS & SONS."

It seems to us that this sums up the situation very thoroughly. The attitude of these houses is really a better protection to the bond-buyer than would be that of a house which would guarantee millions of securities and still be unable to carry out the contract. As was stated in one of the letters, the real situation is in effect very much the same as though the securities were actually guaranteed, inasmuch as the bond houses make sure in the first place that the securities offered by them are all they are represented to be.

We stated in the article referred to above that we had known of instances where bond houses had recalled issues of bonds and refunded the money rather than have their integrity questioned in the slightest degree. Such action has been taken more than once, and it is in accord with the traditions of the best houses.

Home and Foreign Notes

—A NEW YORK CITY institution needs a salaried missionary (either sex) for spiritual work, open-air services, visitation in hospitals, prisons, etc. Address "City Missionary," care of CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

—THE NATIONAL FEDERATION of Gospel Missions held its annual convention and election at Poughkeepsie, N. Y., recently. There was a large attendance and many excellent speeches were made. The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: C. H. Madison, president; T. L. Fretz, first vice-president; Miss Sarah Wray, second vice-president; James Haig, third vice-president; H. D. Gordon, fourth vice-president; Mrs. D. H. Wright, secretary; Sidney Whittmore, treasurer; W. W. Smith and Rev. W. H. Hubbard, directors.

—HOW CHRISTIANITY and civilization march hand in hand is well described in a letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from Rev. Frank Paton, son of the famous missionary, John L. Paton, of the New Hebrides Mission. He writes: "It is very noticeable that until the Gospel of Jesus Christ has cleansed the heart, and inspired it with new life and aims, there is no change in the outward social conditions of the heathen. It is only when a man becomes a Christian that he realizes that the clean heart must have a clean body, the clean body a clean house, the clean house a clean village, and the clean village clean surroundings. You can tell the moment you come in sight of a village whether it is Christian or heathen, and this kind of growth applies to all departments of native life. The natives are growing in the scale of civilization, but only as they are growing in the knowledge of Jesus Christ."

BATHING THE DOLL

Marie is my dolly and she shall be clean
As the splendidest dolly that ever was seen.
From her head to her feet I shall scrub her, you s
Exactly as mother each day washes me;
And then I shall dress her, as all mothers shoul
For she is so pretty and always so good.
And I love my sweet dolly, my precious Marie
As well, every bit, as my mother loves me.

e was sitting in a hammock on th front veranda when he came across th lawn briskly and sprang up the st s in a couple of strides.

arry thought she had never looked s lovely, as he stood a moment in si it admiration.

Well, your Reverence, can't you s at least, 'Good afternoon'?" she a d, the color in her cheeks deepen- ir and spreading under his gaze.

No, I'm struck speechless. But if y ll move along an inch or two I'll s it in due and ancient form."

moment later he said, more seri- ou y: "I have something important to te you."

he glanced up quickly, and as he c ght the look in her eyes, he ex- cl ned: "You already know! Who tc you?"

Mother. Your father told my fa er last evening, and, of course, he tc mother."

arry felt a sudden pang at what s ned almost like a betrayal of con- fi ce on the part of his father.

Well, what do you think of it?" he a d.

I sympathize with your views and ic ls, and all that," said she, slowly. " is noble of you to be willing to s ifice yourself, but don't you think th e is plenty of opportunity to do g d right here at home? It seems a sl ne to give up your fine prospects, a bury your talents out in Japan."

faint smile hovered around H ry's lips as he recognized Mrs. S nders' familiar mode of expression. H drew a chair in front of the ham- m k, and sat where he could better w ch her face.

You have told me what somebody el thinks," said he; "now please tell m what you think, dearest."

I think you are awfully good to wa t to go," she responded, impul- s ly, "but I don't want you to go. I c n't bear to have you leave me."

But I am not going to leave you, dr. We'll hasten our marriage, and w l go together, of course."

You must not leave me," she re- p ted, insistently.

s Harry studied her countenance h noticed for the first time that, while t upper part of her face resembled h father, she had her mother's chin, u eveloped as yet, but with a promise o uture strength. He was well aware o er subjection to her mother's will. I vas the one thing about her that he d not like. Could it be that she pos- s ed latent force sufficient to resist h mother's dictation? Could he in- d e her now to rebel?

aking both her hands in his, he p aded: "You will go with me, won't y , darling?"

he made no reply, and he went on, fi ly: "Dearest, you are mine. You a pledged to me. You must promise t go with me."

Wait till to-morrow," she said.

No. You must tell me now," he p sisted.

Ie could feel her hands tremble. I believed she was yielding, and he f red to allow her an opportunity to s her mother again before the ques- t n was decided.

Ethel, sweetheart, look at me. I n't you love me, darling? Wouldn't y u be content to be with me any- w ere? Surely you cannot love me v lly, if you must debate a question l this."

Harry!" she cried, reproachfully, h under lip quivering. "You know I l e you. I only ask for another day i which to think it over, and to talk v h——"

There was a sound of footsteps in t hall, and a moment later her m ther appeared in the doorway.

Oh, good afternoon, Harry," said t latter, advancing to greet him. "ou are the very man I wished to see, a out those new cottas for the choir b s, you know. Ethel, dear, bring a other chair, please."

Harry ground his teeth, and won- dered if she had been listening all the while. It seemed quite possible, for she took good care not to leave him alone again with Ethel, and he was obliged to depart without obtaining the desired promise.

The next evening when he returned to learn Ethel's decision, he found Luke Johnson sitting on the veranda steps.

"Good ebenin', sah," said Luke, sol- emnly, rising and touching his hat; and, as Harry asked if Miss Ethel were in, he replied, "She? Laws, no. Dey's gone to de seashaw." He glanced cautiously toward the house, and lowering his voice continued: "I reckon dey'd had some kin' ob a combustion. De Missus was on her high horse, I'm tellin' you, an' Miss Ethel look lak she'd been cryin'."

"Gone!" exclaimed Harry. "For how long? Wasn't it unexpected?"

Luke didn't know, and advised him to inquire in the house. The maid who came to the door said that the ladies had gone away for a couple of months, and had left for him a note, which she forthwith handed him. Thrusting it in his pocket he hurried to his study, and there tore it open and read in Ethel's handwriting:

"Dear Harry: After mature reflec- tion my answer is that you must choose between me and Japan. Hoping to receive your decision soon, believe me

"Sincerely yours,
"ETHEL."

"Dictated by the General!" mut- tered Harry, savagely.

The curtness and coldness of the note, and the bald manner of putting the choice, produced the precise effect that Mrs. Saunders doubtless desired and intended. He was not only hurt, but angry.

Seizing a pen, he drew a sheet of paper toward him, and wrote as fol- lows:

"Dear Ethel: I have chosen Japan.
"HARRY."

After reading this several times, he tore it up, and wrote again:

"Dear Ethel: I am going to Japan. If, however, you should at any time change your mind, remember that I am waiting for you, dearest, and that I am Ever yours,
"HARRY."

This he sealed and mailed promptly, before his anger had time to cool; and although by the following day he had regretted his haste, and had thought of a dozen ways in which he might have expressed himself better, he had no intention of altering his decision, but at once began preparations for his journey. He started for his future home without seeing Ethel again.

III.

During the first four months of his absence he received no word directly from Ethel. Then came a cablegram from her containing these three words: "Ruth one sixteen."

"What in the world does it mean?" thought he, as he studied the message.

Suddenly, with wildly beating heart, he picked up his Bible, and turning to the book of Ruth, the first chapter and the sixteenth verse, he read as follows: "Entreat me not to leave thee, or to return from following after thee: for whither thou goest, I will go; and where thou lodgest, I will lodge: thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God."

Happening to glance at the date of the message, he exclaimed: "She sent it on her twenty-first birthday. She has control of her aunt's legacy, and this is her Declaration of Independ- ence. That is what it means—she is coming!"

Puffed Wheat Served With Blackberries

Fifteen Million Dishes Every Month

Since summer began it has been almost impossible for our mills to supply enough Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice. People are eating fifteen million dishes per month.

For breakfast, they serve them with sugar and cream. Or they mix them with berries. These crisp grains with berries form an enticing blend.

For luncheons or suppers—for between-meals or bedtime—they are served in a bowl of milk. That's a delightful dish. Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice are as crisp as crackers, and four times as porous as bread. And they supply the whole grain, as crackers and bread do not.

All that needs to be done before serving is to crisp the grains in a warming oven.

Just Imagine This:

If you are not one of these users, we ask you to imagine this:

Gigantic kernels of wheat or rice, puffed to eight times natural size. Made so porous and crisp that they melt in the mouth. Made so digestible—by exploding the starch granules—that digestion begins before the grains reach the stomach.

Great, nut-like grains, shaped just as they grew. Ready to absorb whatever you mix with them.

Can anyone wonder that people are eating fifteen million dishes per month?

Puffed Wheat, 10c
Puffed Rice, 15c

Except in Extreme West

These are Prof. Anderson's foods—the foods that are shot from guns.

The wheat or rice kernels are put into sealed guns. Then the guns are revolved for sixty minutes in a heat of 550 degrees.

That heat turns the moisture in the grain to steam, and the pressure becomes tremendous. Then the guns are unsealed and the steam explodes. Instantly every starch granule is blasted into a myriad particles.

The grains are puffed to eight times their natural size. Yet the coats are unbroken, the shapes are unaltered. We have the whole grains made porous and crisp and digestible.

Good for Hot Days

These curious, digestible, ready-cooked cereals are the ideal summer foods. They are so delightful that four people in five prefer them to all other cereals. We have proved this by lunch room tests.

And they don't tax the stomach. Never before were cereal foods made even half so digestible.

It is true they don't last long. Children are apt to want several servings, several times a day. But what better food can you serve to them than these whole grains made wholly digestible?

We ask you to order one package of each—order them now from your grocer. Do this to see what you've missed. (59)

What Christian Life Means

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

THE story is of a householder who hired workmen for his vineyard, some at 6 A.M., others at 9, others at noon, others at 3 P.M., and some even as late as 5 o'clock, which was "the eleventh hour"; and paid them all a full day's wages at 6, at which the earlier comers complained—not because they had gotten less than their due, but because others who had "not borne the burden and heat of the day" had received an equal wage and so apparently an equal reward.

Labor a Universal Duty

This parable plainly teaches that every life should be one of service, and that the service should begin in the early morning of life. God has a special work for every plant and insect and animal—much more for every boy and girl, for every man and woman. The sun was made to shine, the cow to give milk, the flower to furnish beauty and fragrance, the vegetable to contribute food. Regardless of the need of wages, in order to develop ourselves as well as to bless others, we are all called to do some useful service. Recreation in proper measure is a duty, but idleness and laziness are rebellion against God.

It is a mark of high rank among the Manchus to have finger nails three or four times as long as the fingers, to prove that they do no labor. In this busy age these finger nails are sometimes detached, and worn ceremonially—as was the case with the very able Empress Dowager, Tsi An—but they represent a conception of gentility by no means confined to the ruling tribe of China, and found to a surprising degree even among professed believers of the Bible. It is a time to emphasize the Bible's teaching that all must serve, or sin in refusing to do so, for this is an automobile period of unexampled luxury, when even farming villages of two thousand inhabitants in the United States have forty automobiles, costly not only in their purchase and repairs, but more in the precious time—beyond all reasonable need—that they lure young men to waste in the very prime of life. There can be no doubt that not only many boys and men among the rich, but also among the poor, and a yet larger number of women, regard labor as something to be endured only from present necessity or with a view to escaping it so soon as enough wealth has been secured to hire others to do all the serving. The teaching of the first pages of the Bible and of the fourth commandment, that all should labor six days in the week in some useful way, is reiterated in the fundamental meaning of this lesson.

All Should Serve God in the Morning of Life

"To this end was I born," was the text on which an eminent Chicago pastor was at work when his nephew, an easy-going young man, came in, and being told the text said, frankly, "I don't know what I was born for." A few days later he was in the Iroquois Theatre when it burned, and saved nineteen people from a fiery death, sacrificing himself in saving the last. His dying words, spoken with a satisfied smile on his face, were, "Now I know." In contrast let us recall the story of a young lady who a few days after the fire was observed to be weeping on a Chicago street car. An elderly gentleman ventured to offer comfort, and found, as he supposed, that it was a sorrow connected with the same theatre fire. She was weeping not because she had lost friends, and despite the fact that she had escaped—weeping because she had escaped a life so absorbed in securing her own salvation that she had made no effort to save others. Perhaps she had been putting her selfishness in contrast to the unselfishness of the young man above described. It seemed to her more to be desired to die in unselfish service, than to escape by selfishness. And we need not wait for fire or flood or shipwreck to bring opportunities for heroic unselfishness. It is hardest of all to be heroic in the daily humdrum. To save the bodies of men from danger is a noble service in which many a rough fireman, many a fearless lifesaver has fulfilled some part at least of the purpose of his life; but to save boys and young men and girls and women from a selfish and therefore a sinful life, to enlist them, with ourselves, in the great service of making the world happier and better, that is a complete fulfilment of the plan of God for our lives. And to do this, not in old age alone, but all our days, is itself a supreme reward.

Saved Not by Merit but by Mercy

But the most distinctive teaching of this parable undoubtedly is that God welcomes to his service even the tardy and undeserving, who do not accept his call until the sunset watch of life, or even the dying hour, and that he does this because it is not our worth but his grace, not our merit but his mercy, that determines his action. Those who come at the eleventh hour, or at the sixth or third—those who come early at the first call, in childhood, cannot claim "the gift of God, eternal life," on the basis of desert. We are all unworthy, though in different degrees. "Not for works of righteousness which we have done but through his mercy he saves us, by the washing of regeneration and the renewing of the Holy Ghost."

A poor feeble-minded fellow, who had hardly sense enough to live as a whom salvation had come as to a little child, applied for membership in the church. The elders were very doubtful whether he understood the plan of salvation sufficiently. He was puzzled by their theological questions, but again and again he answered:

> I am a poor sinner and nothing at all,
> But Jesus Christ is my all and in all.

It was the whole plan of salvation in a sentence, and he won his way by his firm grip on those two great fundamentals, his own unworthiness and the worthiness of Christ.

Deathbed Repentance

It may sometimes be the case, as it was probably in that of the penitent thief of Calvary, that the hour of death is the first hour in which a soul has clearly seen the way of salvation. We sing:

> The dying thief rejoiced to see
> That fountain in his day,
> And there may I, though vile as he,
> Wash all my sins away.

The man who deliberately plans to devote his life to sin and repent just in time to escape hell is viler and more than the penitent thief, who stumbled in the darkness while the other strugglers in the noonday. The story will bear repeating, because so pertinent of the dying business man, who had been dedicated to God by a Christian mother and taught from childhood the way to God, and for whom a Christian wife had long prayed. He himself often admitted his duty to be a Christian, but postponed it from selfish devotion to business, and cowardly fear of the sneers of associates. When death came on him suddenly and he was urged to repent and seek God, and in his hesitation to give God the place squeezed orange of his life, was referred to the penitent thief, he claimed bitterly: "There is no hope

th. The penitent thief had not for ye s resisted the prayers of a mother an a wife and the kind persuasions of te ers and pastors." And so he died wi out God, and without hope.

ıd besides, repentance is not a mere ac of will, that we can turn it on in a mo ent at the prompting of a great fe. Besides, dying persons are seldo in condition to think clearly, and ar often, through drugs or delirium, ur nscious of their state. To plan lo for a deathbed repentance is lik to harden the soul, so that no de e for repentance will come.

ıt, on the other hand, let us not doı t that Christ will welcome a since repentance even at the eleventh ho. "Him that cometh unto me," he sa, "I will in no wise cast out." "Tough your sins be as scarlet, they shl be as white as wool."

is an awful risk to postpone conseation to the service of Christ even til life's noon, not because God's m y will give out, but because the hu an heart is hardened by rejected intations. The statistics of conversi show that a very great majority of hose who live a Christian life begin inhe teens, when the formative tides of fe are stirring to love and ideality ar aspiration. To delay beyond the peod of youth is to risk the permane loss of life's greatest boon and deest joy—the daily fellowship of Cist. A banker recently released fı n prison, to which his stealing of trt funds had sent him, exclaimed: "leedom does not mean much to me. M wife is dead, and she was the only or who cared for me." Pardon does nc mean much when life has been w ted.

The Greatest Earthly Reward

he shilling wage of this parable p bably represents the one thing that G gives to every penitent soul, howev late he comes, namely, the assurare of heaven. But even in heaven "e star differeth from another star in glory," and all stars from the "s oking flax" that God in his mercy w not quench, which is "scarcely s ed." And long before we go to h ven a Christian service begun in y th yields its daily dividends of h lth and happiness. To a healthy m d, the reward chiefly sought is not e ape from hell or even entrance to h ven, but fulness of life—the fulfi ent of God's plan in us, making the most of ourselves for God's sake and for humanity's sake.

Willet M. Hays, assistant secretary of the United States Department of Agriculture, told the Northern Minnesota Development Association that "the world is looking on while we farmers plod along in our unorganized, unsystematic, half-hearted way; and the world believes that were our people broader and better trained we could produce much better yields than we do; and we are forced to admit," he added, "that the world is right."

"Whether our activity be religious, social, political or economic," he continued, "we are on a fifteen-bushel basis with a twenty-five-bushel opportunity."

A majority of our CHRISTIAN HERALD million Bible class, that every week reads our lessons, are farmers; they can honor God and help men as well as themselves by living up to their opportunities agriculturally. We are all bound to do our daily task well for its own sake, as well as for the sake of our families, and because we shall so increase our ability to give to others. A man who gives thousands of dollars to missions and moral reforms met the writer a few days since in Denver and said, "Do you know there is but one text in the Bible that justifies hoarding, and that only as a preliminary of giving?" "Let him that stole steal no more, but rather let him labor that he may give to him that needeth"—and let us not forget that the best way to meet the needs of the needy is to cut the vice roots of poverty, so far as possible.

But it is not alone in agriculture that men are "on a fifteen-bushel basis with a twenty-five-dollar opportunity." Many churches are farming as clumsily as the most backward of farmers. See the denominational year books and note the spiritual crops—a hundred spiritual farmers working a whole year and having only two souls for their harvest! Eight Sunday School teachers at work a whole year in the very garden spot of life, and only one saved pupil to show for it!

"What shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and forfeit his life?" The old view of repentance for the sake of the future life alone or chiefly was a very shallow view. The chief argument for beginning a Christian life early is that we may so make the most of life.

'Tis life of which our souls are scant;
More life, and richer, that we want.

THE RUMSELLER

I WILL paint you a sign, rumseller,
And hang it above your door;
A truer and better signboard
Than ever you had before.
I will paint with the skill of a master.
And many shall pause to see
This wonderful piece of painting
So like the reality.

I will paint yourself, rumseller,
As you wait for that fair young boy,
Just in the morn of manhood,
A mother's pride and joy.
He has no thought of stopping,
But you greet him with a smile,
And you seem so gay and friendly
That he pauses to chat awhile.

I will paint you again, rumseller;
I will paint you as you stand,
Holding a glass of liquor
Sparkling in either hand.
He wavers, but you urge him—
"Drink! Pledge me just this one,"
And he lifts the glass and drains it,
And the hellish work is done.

And next I will paint a drunkard—
Only a year has flown—
But into a loathsome creature
The fair young boy has grown.
The work was sure and rapid,
I will paint him as he lies
In deathlike, drunken slumber,
Under the wintry skies.

I will paint the form of the mother,
As she kneels at her darling's side;
Her beautiful boy, who was dearer
Than all the world beside.
I will paint the shape of a coffin,
And label it one word—"Lost!"
I will paint all this, rumseller;
I will paint it free of cost.

The sin, the shame and the sorrow,
The crime, the want and the woe
That were born there in your rumshop,
No hand can paint, you know.
But I'll paint your sign, rumseller,
And many shall pause to view
That wonderful swinging signboard
So terrible, fearfully true!

What it Costs to Create a Saint

FIGURES show the enormous expense of the papal ceremony of making Jeanne d'Arc a saint (Rome, June 24, 1909). The cost of making Jeanne d'Arc a saint was between 260,000 and 270,000 francs, accounted for as follows:

	Francs.
Introductory ceremonies	10,000
Process non cultu	2,000
Process fama sanctitatis	2,000
Process de validitate	2,000
Process to prove the virtues	12,000
Decree for the above	1,000
Final depositions	9,000
Process regarding miracles	12,000
Decree of the above	1,000
Congregation and decree de tuto	3,000
Cost of the ceremonies of beatification	100,000
Other incidentals	50,000

To this must be added 150,000 francs for the decoration of St. Peter's church. Special items are: Wax candles for the papal procession, 1,948 francs; decoration of the papal throne, 12,276 francs; decorations of the altar reared to the new saint, 15,715 francs; gratifications to papal officials and of St. Peter's church, 16,396 francs.

The Subscriber and the Advertiser

SOME TIME ago we received a letter from one of our subscribers complaining that she had ordered and paid for some goods that were advertised in our columns, but had not received them. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD called the advertiser's attention to the fact, and was assured that the lady would receive full satisfaction. Another order was shipped to her. The goods arrived too late for her use, whereupon she returned them and asked to have her money refunded. To show the attitude taken by the firm in this matter we quote the following letter just received from our subscriber:

Dear Christian Herald:

"Have just received check drawn on the Corn Exchange Bank, New York, from the ——— & ——— Co., New York City. I am sorry to have caused you unnecessary trouble, and would have lost confidence had it not been for your guarantee and the reappearance of their ad. in your reliable paper week after week.

Respectfully yours,
"I. M. S."

This instance is typical of a number which have occurred lately. As a matter of fact, advertisers are coming more universally to believe in that business maxim—"the customer is never wrong." In other words, they consider it not only honest, but good business, to please their customers, no matter what the trouble. Although it may sometimes cost the advertiser more than the order is worth, yet in the long run it begets a sense of mutual confidence and good feeling that cannot but result in a better understanding between the merchant who advertises and the subscriber who buys.

Whenever any of our subscribers is defrauded by an advertiser in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD we will make good the claim, provided that the subscriber, who must be of record, has mentioned THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in writing to the advertiser, and provided the claim is made to us within two months of the date of the appearance of the advertisement.

Questions and Answers

In forwarding MSS. to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, enclose stamped envelopes for return, if unavailable.

A. B. C., Judsonia, Ark. In Num. 16: 32 it is said that the earth swallowed "all the men that appertained unto Korah, and all their goods." In Num. 25: 11 it is said, "Notwithstanding the children of Korah died not." Are we to understand that Korah's family escaped?

Either the children were not participants in their parents' crime, or they showed evidence of timely repentance. It is evident that they were not included in the punishment of the principals. Korah's descendants became famous in David's time. Their names are prefixed to fourteen Psalms.

W. S. W., DeSoto, Mo. 1. Explain Matt. 5: 26, 39, 44. 2. Also Matt. 18: 17.

1. Verse 26 was prudential advice to settle disputes quietly instead of resorting to law. Doubtless also the lesson was conveyed that sinful man should make his peace with God and so escape the punishment due to unrepented and unpardoned sin. Verse 39 counsels meekness, and the bearing of indignity without retaliation. Verse 44 is in line with the other two passages quoted, and is enunciated with even greater emphasis and authority. "Love your enemies," means be gentle, tolerant, compassionate, forgiving, helpful, desiring their good at all times. 2. Jesus was here showing them how, by gentle yet dignified steps, they might administer rebuke to an erring brother without giving offense, and lead him back to the right path. When every means had been exhausted, they were to regard him, not as irreclaimable, but as "one without," as the Jews regarded the Gentiles and publicans.

W. C. B., Muskogee, Okla. 1. Please explain Job 14: 12. 2. Also Matt. 5: 48.

1. The whole of the chapter is pessimistic. Job, depressed by his own afflictions, is describing the common misery of mankind. In v. 12 he tells how man in his grave will sleep until the resurrection, which is to be preceded by the dissolution of the firmament. But in v. 15 he passes out of his gloom to a brighter theme—his own hope of immortality. See also Job 19: 25, 26. The latter passage is more correctly rendered in the Revised, which says: "Yet without my flesh shall I see God—" etc. 2. Jesus here refers to the full-orbed completeness of the great divine Model—our Father in heaven—whose peculiar excellence he wishes his followers to imitate, and not the excellences of the world, which are selfish and unspiritual.

D. C. I., Rockville, Md. I noticed in THE MAIL-BAG last fall the answer to the question, How many of the Israelites that left Egypt entered the promised land? You answered: Two, Caleb and Joshua. Some minister out in the West contradicted that statement, and showed that there were more that entered.

It is clearly stated in Num. 26: 65 that of all the host of Israelites who left Egypt no man, save Joshua and Caleb, entered Canaan. Whether this applied alike to men and women, and only the new generation born in the wilderness were permitted to enter, is uncertain, though most scholars take that view.

Grace E. C., Hampden Highlands, Me. 1. Please explain Luke 2: 35. 2. Also Matt. 10: 34.

1. The passage was prophetic and referred to the pain and anguish she would yet endure by reason of the obloquy to which the Child would be exposed, and the agonies he would suffer on the cross. 2. This foreshadowed the strife, discord and conflict that would arise among the pagan nations who would oppose Christianity; it would be the opposition of eternally hostile principles and would often sever the dearest ties.

Mrs. E. P., East Williamson, N. Y. 1. Please explain the latter part of the verse Gen. 3: 22: "And take also of the tree of life, and eat, and live forever." 2. We are told that Noah was one hundred and twenty years building the ark. Is this taken from the Bible, and if so, where may I find the reference?

1. The tree was a sacramental sign or pledge of that immortal life which would have been the reward of obedience; but by his disobedience, man forfeited the right to partake of it. Lest he should eat and thereby grasp at earthly immortality he was driven forth, as the condition of the pair would have been a curse rather than a blessing, as the tree could not restore the inner life of the soul. 2. The passage referred to is Gen. 6: 3. It has been interpreted as a respite or season of grace granted to man before the impending visitation of the Flood.

S. S. S., Farnham, Quebec. 1. Is the profession of a trained nurse a desirable one for a man to learn? 2. Is it overcrowded? 3. Is it well paid? 4. How long is the course of training? 5. While taking it, could one earn enough to meet expenses?

1. The profession of a trained nurse is a good one. 2. It is not overcrowded. 3. The wages of a good graduate nurse average about $25 per week. 4. The course of training in our New York Mills School, connected with Bellevue Hospital, is two years. 5. While training your living is given you, and usually a small salary besides, perhaps $10 or $12 per month.

Reader, Dibble, Okla. Please explain I. John 3: 9.

It means that one who is born of God—that is, converted and regenerated—will be pure and clean in all his ways and will live a holy life in a physical sense, as well as spiritually. He will keep the body and its desires in complete subjection, because the desires of the flesh will have no dominion over him. The body will thus be a fitting temple for the regenerated spirit to dwell in. The higher nature, as begotten of God, abhors sin. The "seed" is God's living Word which is in us a continual means of sanctification.

F. P. M., Birmingham, Ala. Is a vow to God binding when made at the time of physical sickness when suffering from an attack of nervous hysteria and mental strain and dread? The vow, under other circumstanees, would never have been made.

Vows are not to be set aside lightly. They are generally made in a time of great stress, or in some sudden emergeney, or at the outset of some dangerous or momentous undertaking. The faithful performanee of such a saered pledge has in all ages been considered a highly religious duty. It is better not to vow at all, than to vow and not perform. At the same time, it has frequently been held that a minor, a person without authority, or one who is laboring under such severe strain as to be mentally unbalanced, or who is compelled under threats, may be released from a vow taken under such conditions.

Ada J. P., West Philadelphia, Pa. I want to thank you for the flag—also the picture. This is what I thought when I opened the flag:

"The flag—God bless it!
Whene'er you view it
On sea or land;
The thought come to you—
Made by woman's hand."

A beautiful and fitting sentiment, both patriotie and gallant.

B. S., Pittsburg, Pa. What is the oldest known tomb in existence?

There are many ancient tombs the age of which cannot be reliably determined. Probably the oldest is that of a woman whose rocky tomb enclosing her remains is in the possession of the Egypt Exploration Fund in England. By her side were found toilet artieles, beads and ointment jars, indicating a primitive belief in and preparation for a future state. This tomb, whieh was found at Abydos, is believed to be older than the pyramids; some antiquarians say it is probably of the date of 7000 B.C. These figures, however, may be changed with the very next judgment of the archæologists on the subject.

An Old Reader, Degraff, O. What countries still tolerate human slavery?

The great centre of the slave-trade now is in the Niger regions, the Fulani territories and the So Roto Empire. The British power is slowly driving it out. The Arabs are now the chief slave-holding people. Cardinal Lavigerie said about ten years ago, "It is only Moslems that advocate slavery and buy slaves. No mufti or teacher of the Koran protests against it, and no Moslem judge condemns it."

S. C. B., West Auburn, Me. Please explain II. Tim. 2: 13: "If we believe not, yet he abideth faithful; he cannot deny himself."

The more accurate rendering is "if we are continuous in unbelief"—that is, if we go to the extreme limit, yet he remains constant faithful and without shadow of change. Be supremely good, true, and wise, he is consist in all things, and no matter how we may and wander into error, he cannot break word or deny himself, as such weakness w be impossible to infinite majesty and omni tence. We may change, but he never. lievers can take comfort in the thought that is faithful to his promises.

Poles Celebrating the Five Hundredth Anniversary of the Battle of Grunewald

THOUSANDS of Poles who have found homes in America have been celebrating with great enthusiasm the five hundredth anniversary of the battle of Grunewald, which freed them from the rule of the Teutonie Knights and made Poland independent in 1410. Fifty thousand were gathered on Staten Island for the day, while in Philadelphia there was an equally interesting celebration. A great many uniformed companies were present, wearing the famous Uhland mortarhoard helmets worn by the Poles in battle. The Teutonie Knights were formed at first to fight the heathen. They conquered the wild tribes of Prussia, Poland and Lithuania, but remained as masters in Poland after the work was done. The Prince of Lithuania married the heiress of Poland and turned on the Knights. The Grand Master Ulrich and fifty thousand knights and men-at-arms fell in the conflict.

DOUKHOBORS MARCHING AGAIN

By FELIX J. KOCH

A FEW days ago news came from Winnipeg that the mounted police at Kamsack, in Saskatchewan, had received hurry orders to go to Veregie, several miles distant, where the Doukhobors were again on the rampage. When the police came to within half a mile of the settlement, they met a party of thirty-five Doukhobors, who had thrown off most of their clothing. They said in reply to questions that they had come out to "meet the Messiah."

With much persuasion, they were returned to their villages, where they kept up a continuous chanting of hymns for several days. All this was in mid-July, in the centre of the settlement. Then the excited devotees gathered for another rite, the objective point of which seemed to be to remove every stitch of their clothing and to pile these into a heap; then to take their money and jewels and place these also on the pyramid, and finally to set fire to the entire mass of clothes and belongings. Meanwhile, the police took charge as best they could, and succeeded, finally, in getting the excited Doukhobors into an empty building, where they locked them in, while the officers made a search for clothing. But when clothing was found, the Doukhobors refused to wear it. This was a peculiar situation and it seemed as though force would be necessary to persuade them to assume the habiliments of civilization. More police were sent for, as other members of the Doukhobor community refused point blank to assist in restoring order and decency.

These simple, earnest people, whose periodical outbursts of religious fanaticism give rise no doubt to more uneasiness than they deserve, began to emigrate to the "great lone land" about twelve years ago. They came here from Russia. Altogether there are now perhaps 9,300 of them in West Canada, distributed over the country in villages. European fashion, one finds them averse to inhabiting the isolated farms. Even there villages are communal. Everything is part of the common possessions; every one helps to support every other. All things grown go into the common treasury. Wages, too, are placed in a common fund.

While the men are thus engaged, the women work in the fields. Boys of fourteen attend the plow, guide the ox through the furrow, while mothers and sisters do the rest. All are workers and all seem to have a common interest. They have some curious customs, however. They are strict vegetarians. They hold excellent farmland for the cultivation of produce. Many of the men who hire out get from thirty-five to forty-five dollars a month with board. Farmers who hire them make no complaints against the Doukhobors. But the Doukhobor is unlike other laborers. He is always ready to perform any little duty which may arise, such, for example, as repairing a break in the harness or a wagon-spring. He does not need to be told.

Types of the Prosperous Doukhobor Farmers

The girls are most picturesque as they work in the fields on the communal farms. One party of girls puts the wheat in "shocks." Another body of girls acts as gleaners, and it is one of the prettiest sights of all the great lone land to see such a company go out in the morning, each with a heavy home-made rake over her shoulder and a bunch of carrots under her arm—the food for the day. The women's white blouses are immaculate. Their robust figures and glowing cheeks show them to be full of health and vigor. In fact all the Doukhobors are types of health and contentment. One cannot but admire them as they come along, chanting their native songs.

Over the lone land there are numbers of Doukhobor villages. Perhaps the best of these are in the Swan River Valley, where they are built in streets. Every house is built very solidly, with great beams, which the men have hewn. The beds are mere bunks, built into the ground.

Another strong point regarding these people is their morals. They have been hastily condemned by those who don't really know about them. One cannot be among the Doukhobors long without realizing what a cleanly, moral, hospitable and friendly people they are. The women are extremely modest.

In the villages they have stores of their own. They have even their own flour-mills. They have men who are practical workmen in every line of trade. These crafts they have learned in Russia. They are adepts in tin and iron-work. In decorative work, in making zinc sheets and galvanized iron-work they are to be commended. Each village has a "boss," who is elected annually. He sees to it that all in the village work for the interest of the Doukhobors.

It has been spread about in a rather unfair way that the Doukhobors, owing to fanaticism, are useless as settlers. They are really hardworking and desirable settlers. Only a few of the most orthodox are fanatics. The great majority are sincere in their condemnation of this small minority. One man usually starts off the march and numbers of others go along. The Doukhobors have offered to support those who go on these marches if they will only desist and settle down in any village they choose; but they reply that they are "looking for Christ, and must go out and meet him."

One cannot but admire the simple faith of these people. Whoever has met the Doukhobor cannot but be impressed with the fact that they firmly believe the doctrines they preach.

THE IDLERS REPROACHED

TEXT—Matt. 20:6
"Why stand ye here all the day idle?"

THERE is a ring of reproach in the very question itself. It implies that no one has a right to be idle without an excuse. There is also an element of surprise that those addressed should be thus indifferently violating the very laws of life. And to every one who has the slightest appreciation of life, idleness is disgusting in the extreme, quite beneath the dignity and wholly unworthy of manhood.

"There is no excellence without great labor" is the law of life. And the Book of Nature on every page verifies the truth of this statement. Our very existence is the product of contending forces. Life persists through its struggle with death.

Astronomers tell us that the moon has lost its rotary motion and no longer turns upon its axis. And in consequence of its loss of activity one side glows with perpetual day, while the other is wrapped in endless night. Its atmosphere has disintegrated, leaving neither air nor water. And all forms of life, both of animal and vegetable, if there ever were any, have ceased to exist. And because of this the moon is called a dead planet, and ever hangs before us in perpetual idleness, a striking example of inactivity and death.

Idleness Produces Death

And the records of human life through all its varied evolutions bear a like testimony. It has ever been a race for life in which the "survival of the fittest" has determined the winner.

We see that everywhere in nature idleness produces death, but activity develops life. And ever in the onward sweep of human progress, decadence is the result of inactivity, while achievement is the product of great labor.

In Matt. 20: 7: "They say unto him, Because no man hath hired us. He saith unto them, Go ye also into the vineyard; and whatsoever is right, that shall ye receive."

The answer of those addressed is an attempt to excuse their idleness. And probably no other passage of Scripture is more universally quoted, verbatim or in substance, in every-day life than this. The tramp that calls at the back door for a hand-out of old clothes and something to eat, when asked why he is in that condition replies: "Because no man hath hired me." The street-loafer, when asked why he is not at work, always begins a tirade against the hard times, because no man hath hired him and there is nothing to do.

This Scripture is also much used, or more properly speaking much abused, in the church. Often when a minister looks over the church roll he finds many names that have no personality in the church life. In other words he finds a host of idlers, who are worth nothing to God or man so far as spiritual life is concerned. They give little or nothing for the support of Christ's kingdom, even when abundantly able; they neglect the Bible School and prayer meeting altogether; they seldom or never attend the church services; they deny themselves the pleasures and blessings of Christian fellowship and the sweet communion of the Lord's table; they openly and before the world treat the whole cause of Christ with a spirit of indifference and neglect, that is hurtful and damaging in the extreme. And when asked why they are not at work in the Master's vineyard, but stand all the day idle, they reply, Because we find nothing to do.

The Work that Calls Us

Our Lord's reply, "Go ye also into the vineyard," takes away from humanity forever all possibility of excuse for idleness in the great fertile fields of Christian duty. The kingdom of Christ suffers much loss every day from lack of workers. The harvest truly is plenteous, but the laborers are few. Every one in the church and in the world, who has a mind to work for the highest interests of mankind, can find abundant opportunity in the service of the Lord. The ranks are full in no department of labor, and the urgent need of more consecrated workers is deeply felt.

From out the awful darkness of heathen ignorance come the extended hands and pleading voices of a billion souls, asking for light that they may be delivered from the cruelties of superstition and idolatry. And of the five hundred millions of souls in the so-called Christian lands there is a large percentage without God and without hope in the world. And, so long as one of these souls remains unsaved, there is work to be done in the kingdom of Christ. For one soul is worth the entire concentrated effort of the kingdom. And confronted by such a stupendous work, how dare any one stand all the day idle and say there is nothing to do?

But, before the evangelization of the world can be fully realized, there is a tremendous work to be done among the Christian nations in overcoming the organized forces of sin that have been eating like a cankering sore at the heart of our civilization. And the commanding place which we hold among the Christian nations demands that we take the leading part, both in the work of moral reform and world evangelism. And it takes but a superficial glance at our national life to reveal the fact that we have much to do at home before we can worthily perform this national and Christian world-wide function.

Our body politic is much diseased. On every hand are to be seen all kinds of dishonest methods in getting office. The power of the great political parties has largely passed into the hands of political monopolies and demagogues, who do not fail to use this power for their own advantage. Intellect and character are no longer sufficient qualifications for high office. The essential requisite is financial backing. It takes money to be elected to any office of importance. And in addition to election frauds there is much corrupt legislation and administration. Money has become a potent factor of corruption in our whole political organization. And herein is need for a great work of reform. The time has come when Christian citizenship must assert itself and Christian patriotism must manifest itself, not in slavery to a political boss, nor in blind allegiance to a political party, but in fidelity to the highest interests of our national life.

The Struggle for Gold

During the last few decades, the most prominent characteristic in the world's life has been its marvelous financial achievements. And so strong has been the mercenary spirit and so eager the race for gold that financiers have very often lost sight of the value of business integrity and almost any method that will yield enormous profits has become legitimate in the eyes of the great financial world. The East India Company found the opium trade with China very profitable. And when, at the expiration of its charter in 1834, it lost its monopoly, this lucrative business was taken up by a number of English merchants. Soon the opium habit became very common among the masses of the Chinese, and its baleful influences were quite evident. The more educated class felt that the habit was undermining the moral and intellectual life of the nation and influenced the government to close its ports against the opium trade. Then commenced a struggle between the Chinese government and the English merchants: the one trying to protect its citizens, the other smuggling the accursed drug. In 1843 the English government took up the quarrel, and, by invading the Chinese empire with an army, compelled them to pay one and a fourth million pounds for smuggled opium that had been destroyed, four and a half million pounds as a war indemnity, and forced them to open five ports to the English merchants with full rights to carry on the ruinous opium traffic. England forced a helpless nation against its will to take a poison that has blasted its life and riveted upon it a habit from which it can not recover for centuries. And it was all for gold.

No sooner was our flag unfurled in the Philippines than cargo after cargo of intoxicating liquors were unloaded upon the islands, not only permitted by our government, but also protected by it. From the land whence came the promise of freedom came also a slavery more tyrannical and ruinous than even that of the Spanish government. And gold was the consideration. The missionary sent to the islands with Bible in hand to draw the dark lives out into the light and liberty of the Gospel of Christ, and claim them for everything noble and true unto life eternal, was everywhere followed by the dram-shop keeper. And thus it is in almost every heathen land. The man who would save the lost souls must not only face the demon of heathenism in the land to which he goes, but he must also turn and face the demon of vice from his own land, which enjoys the protection of his own government.

Historians speak of the time when the prætorian sold the Roman Empire to Didius Julianus for twelve million dollars, as the most shameful and degenerate period of Roman history. But that was no worse than for legislators, State and national, to sell their vote to capitalists of the twentieth century, or for a Christian nation to license sin to prey upon weak and unfortunate humanity as a source of revenue. This spirit of greed has weakened the moral fibre of our civilization and caused an ebb in our spiritual life. And it must be changed. The conscience of the world must be awakened to the sin of its gross commercialism. It must find its way to the River of Life and wash away the glamour of gold that obscures the true vision of life: beautiful life with all its possibilities of virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness, brotherly kindness, and charity. And this is work to be accomplished in the vineyard of Christ. Is it not a task worthy of the bravest hearts, the strongest arms, and the noblest talents of the world? Where is there another such heroic challenge to duty as the call to enter the vineyard?

The Blight of a Nation

This fair land of ours is fast becoming a helpless victim to the demon monster of intemperance. Every year a tribute of the lives and happiness of thousands of fathers and mothers, husbands and wives, sons and daughters is paid to satisfy its fiendish demands. On every hand are hearts that ache and break for lost loved ones. The term "Intemperance" means more than the drink habit. It includes the gambling den, and all of those immoral and vicious factors that poison the social life, corrupt the political life, and blight the home life of people. It is a great organized body of complex proportions that reaches out in a thousand ways to entrap weak humanity in its devilish clutch.

There are no words in human language that can express the depth of woe, no figures of speech that can picture the hopeless ruin in the life of the victim of this curse, for it runs as deep as the deepest experience of the soul. But I wish that I could draw back the curtain, and reveal to you in a great panoramic view the wreck of its accursed power; for it would steel your heart and nerve your arm against it forever. I wish that I could open the door of the drunkard's home and let you see the misery and want that is there; let you look upon the sad face of the wife, whose eyes have become hollow and sunken with watching and weeping; let you see the children shivering with cold and hear them crying for bread. I wish that I could show you the interior of the gambling den, foul with the odors of tobacco and strong drink, and let you look upon the bloated face, the blood-shot eyes, and hear the vulgar joke and coarse remark, which shows that the last vestige of moral manhood is dead. I wish that I could show you how many of the raving maniacs in the asylums and how much of the simpering idiocy in the institutions for feeble-minded are the wrecks of intemperance. I wish that I could take you through the halls of the penitentiaries of our land, and let you see the faces behind the bars, many of them young men who had brilliant prospects for a useful future. And I wish that you might hear them say that they are there because they committed crimes while their brains were fired with drink.

The Drunkard's Heart

If I could draw back the veil of life and let you look into the drunkard's heart, the vision of corrupted morals, vicious desires, dead manhood, lost self-respect, shattered intellect, and hopeless despair would win you body and soul to the cause of temperance.

I would not have you look upon this gruesome picture of sin and shame and woe and depravity out of idle curiosity, or with the thought that it might help you to live a more righteous life. But I fear at the Christian people, the moral-ving people, the God-fearing people this great nation will not be aroused the full significance of the issue and ade to feel their full personal respon-bility until they have been made to e and to know the real true character this monstrous evil of intemperance.

And let us remember that our deliv-rance is not to be accomplished by a ero like Theseus of old, who will de-roy this monster and free his people rom its power. But this is also work be accomplished in the vineyard of hrist. It depends upon the heroic ction of the Christian citizenship of he nation.

We hear much in political circles bout the great needs of the country. But our greatest national need is the hole Christian world's greatest need. nd that is a great religious revival hat would stir the hearts of men and vomen, who in the mad rush for gold ave indifferently passed by the vital ssues of life; and that would awaken hem to their own needs and to the eeds of the world around them; and hat would constrain them also to enter nto the Lord's vineyard and labor for the moral and spiritual victory of ruth.

With such a vision of need before ur eyes and so many pleading voices ringing in our ears, how dare we stand all the day idle as if there were noth-ing to do? Is it because we have no more interest in ourselves and families than the temporal things of life? Does life mean no more to us than eating and drinking and keeping warm? Life means that much to the flocks and herds grazing upon the hills around us. But to every one who enters as a laborer into the vineyard of Christ, life means the attainment to the infinitude of soul possibility.

PEACE, BE STILL

(Mark 4: 39)

WHEN lowered the sky and wildly blew
The winds across the troubled sea,
And terror seized the trembling crew
That rode on stormy Galilee,
The Saviour heard, and raised his form,
And as he uttered "Peace, be still!"
The winds withdrew, and ceased the storm,
Obedient to his heavenly will.

So when the storms of life assail,
And tempests toss our foundering bark;
When friends are false and prospects fail,
And all the world seems cold and dark:
Jesus will lend a listening ear,
And the crushed heart with gladness fill;
His voice the sorrowing soul will cheer,
And sweetly whisper "Peace, be still!"

VACATION REST, WITH A THREAD

By Rev. J. M. Farrar, D.D.*

"I CAN'T do this sum," said Hal. "I've tried and tried, and I can't get the answer."

"How many times have you tried it?" asked his mamma.

"Three times."

"Well, you go out and ride your tricycle around the house ten times, as fast as you can, and then come in and try three times more."

Out dashed Hal, and soon came in again, his cheeks glowing. "I tell you it's splendid out," he said, "the fresh air is so good, and I've thought of the way to do that sum, too."

"Got the answer—hurrah!" Hal shouted, after a few minutes.

"I thought your brains only needed a little shaking up," said the wise mamma. The request of our text, "rest a while," was given by one who is even wiser and kinder than a mother.

THE disciples had been working very hard. They were in what is called "the school of Christ." They were studying how to work with him and for him. They had some very difficult problems. "They had no leisure so much as to eat." Christ saw they were tired, too tired to study their lessons, so he said, "Come with me to a quiet place and rest a while." What did they do? They rested by studying a new problem. Read the story, Mark 6: 30-44, and you will learn how they were "shaken up" by a new lesson.

Vacation is a "shaking up" time. The body needs shaking up. Romp and run, shout and sing, sleep and snore, wake and walk, eat and exercise, lounge and laugh. Play in the hay, wade in the water, and tramp miles with the men when they go fishing and hunting. The brain needs a "shaking up." Find something to think about when you are out. Study the stars, read lessons from leaves of the tree, study birds in place of books, find new books in running brooks, train your brain. The soul needs "shaking up." See God in every thing that is good. Sing "The Lord is my shepherd," when you are watching the sheep. Find sermons in stones. "Behold the fowls of the air, for they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns, yet your heavenly Father feedeth them. Are ye not much better than they?" The birds will teach you how God cares for you. "Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin. And yet I say unto you, that even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these." Here you find a soul lesson from the lily. Recreation means re-creation, made over again. A shaking up of your life and starting it along new paths. The best vacation is found in a variety, in something new and true.

NOW I hear many of my Juniors say, "We do not go away during our school vacation. We stay at home all the time. There is nothing new to see at home. How can we find something new to keep us from getting blue?" Possibly you could find something new and true not very far from home. You may find some plan for a "shaking up" in the summer shadow of your old home. Will this statement interest you?

Agassiz tells us that he spent an entire summer exploring his back yard. A merchant sent him a check for $1,000 and invited him to take a trip to Europe. Agassiz replied that he was too busy to go to Europe, but proposed to investigate the treasures of his kitchen garden. He began at one corner of the garden and found a little stone that held the outline of a mollusk. Close beside that stone was another that had the section of a fern. He kept on, working across the garden, and after three months, by the first of September, he finally reached the opposite corner of the fence. The great scientist kept his notes and wrote out his studies with great care. Later he published his vacation travels in a garden under the title of Elements of Zoology.

YOU cannot shake up your body, mind and soul without giving them something to do. Too many boys and girls think vacation is a time for idleness. Idleness cannot live without his friend and chum, laziness. Doing something, doing something, doing something! That is the secret of successful work and play.

Shall I tell you a story I found in the Friends for Boys and Girls?

"I like to sew when there is no thread in the machine, it runs so easily," said a little girl.

A good many people, I think, are pretty fond of running their machine without thread.

When I hear a boy talking very largely of the grand things he would do if he only could, and if things and circumstances were only different, and then neglecting every daily duty, and avoiding work and lessons, I think he is running his machine without any thread.

WHEN I see a girl cross and disagreeable in her home, playing when mother is working, sleeping in the morning when she ought to be playing, she, too, is running her machine without any thread.

Ah! This sewing without a thread is very easy indeed, and the life machine will make a great buzzing, but it only wears out the machine. Agassiz really spent his vacation playing in the garden. He kept out of his study, away from his books, got a good shaking up. But he kept a thread in the machine with which he was playing. When you take your vacation do not forget the thread.

* Pastor First Reformed Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. TEXT: "Rest a while." Mark 6:31.

Tommy's Prayer

DURING the years I was at work in the slums of Southeast London, writes Philip I. Roberts, the following example of a simple faith came to my knowledge. A poor little slum-child of about eleven developed a malady which demanded an instant operation. He was taken to Guy's Hospital, where the great doctor who examined him had to tell him that there was just a fighting chance for his life.

The seats of the operating theatre, rising tier above tier like the gallery of a church, were filled with long rows of students, who had come to witness the greatest surgeon of his time use the knife. The little patient was brought in, and, during some preliminaries, placed in a cushioned chair. Looking round at the great throng of men, he said timidly to one of the assistant-doctors: "Please, sir, I should be very glad if one of you gentlemen would say just a little prayer for me."

The surgeon patted him on the head and said: "We'll do our best, my little man. You must be brave."

"Yes," answered the lad, "I'll be brave, sir. But I'd like a wee prayer to ask God to help you to use that knife right—and to help me, too."

There was a profound silence. Nobody moved, so the little slum-child knelt down and said: "Dear Jesus, will you please have mercy on me now, and if I die, will you take me to be with you in heaven? I'm only a poor, weak, little lad, but, please, I'd like to live. So, dear Jesus, please help this kind gentleman, so that he shall do his work right. Amen." Having said that, the boy climbed on the table, and lay back with a smile lighting up his face. The anæsthetic was promptly administered, but so long as there was any consciousness, the boy was heard praying.

The great surgeon stood at the head of the table fully aware that he was about to perform an operation that would test his skill to the utmost. For a moment or so, he was visibly agitated. The students exchanged significant glances. Never had they seen their great chief unnerved before, and his condition now argued but ill for the life of the waif. Yet as he looked on the still moving lips of the prostrate boy, a great calm stole over the doctor. He commenced to operate and immediately realized that the slum-child's prayer was being answered. Coolness of head, steadiness of hand and delicacy of touch, all came as they were needed. The boy's life hung on a mere thread, but the skilful surgeon did not snap it. Though quite the most critical he had ever undertaken, the operation was performed with complete success.

Next morning the surgeon stood in the ward by the bedside of his little patient. Taking his hand, he said: "Well, Tommy, Jesus heard your prayer yesterday." A confident smile lit up the boy's face as he answered: "I knew he would." Then his features clouded over, and he said: "You were very good to me, too, doctor. And I have nothing to give—nothing at all." Then a happy thought came to him, and his face lit up again, and he whispered: "But I can keep on praying to Jesus for you, can't I?" A great lump came into the doctor's throat. "That you can," he answered huskily, "and that will be better than any sort of money, for God knows I sorely need the prayers of one like you!"

Among the Workers

—FIFTEEN VACATION Bible schools for children have been opened in New York under the auspices of the Federation of Churches and other organizations.

—KATE C. MCBETH, a missionary for more than thirty years among the Nez Perees, in Idaho, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that the new "Shaker" religion described in a recent article in this journal by Sarah Endicott Ober, has not appeared among the Nez Perces.

—A NEW IDEA in summer evangelism is the "Board-walk Church." An interdenominational church with this unique name has been established this season at Atlantic City by Evangelist Robert A. Elwood, who preaches every Sunday morning to good-sized audiences in the Savoy Theatre.

Joyful Summer Days at Mont-Lawn

BEAUTIFUL Mont-Lawn — "The Children's Paradise"—is just now looking its loveliest. Matron Hyde and her helpers have an average guest-roll of some 300 little tenement waifs who are enjoying their ten days' outing immensely. The pleasant summer days pass like a dream of life in fairyland. The Children's Temple daily resounds with the songs of the young voices, and the great lawn is a constant scene of juvenile activity. And such appetites! When the youngsters march into "Fort Plenty" to their meals it would do any one good to watch them. First, the grace is sung by all in unison; then the substantial food and the mugs of fresh milk are quickly disposed of and the youngsters are ripe for another frolic. Bedtime—which is early at Mont-Lawn—finds them all eager for the sweet, refreshing sleep to which the snowy cots in the big, well-aired dormitories invite them.

Saturday is a social "field day" at the Children's Home, being given over largely to games and lawn sports. The "Temple hour," however, when the children sing their hymns to the great delight of the visitors, is the bright spot of the day. On Sunday, the Temple ambulatory and every foot of space not filled by the children, is crowded with people who come from the nearby villages to join in the beautiful Gospel service and listen to the wonderful singing of the children. On Sunday, July 17, Rev. Ezra T. Sanford of the North Baptist Church, New York, addressed the children and a good-sized adult audience on "the ships" (Psalm 104: 26). He described five ships that sailed in the Children's Paradise: Fellowship, Worship, Friendship, Scholarship and Generalship, which he happily illustrated in a way that delighted and inspired his audience. Dr. Sanford is a popular visitor at the Home and is always warmly welcomed by our little guests.

The Visiting Evangelists at Our Children's Home

On Saturday, July 23, a notable party visited Mont-Lawn. It included Rev. Arthur J. Smith, superintendent of the Evangelistic Committee of New York City, and his staff of workers, all of whom enjoyed a pleasant holiday at the "Children's Paradise." In the party were Assistant Superintendent Orin Baker, Rev. N. P. Dame, the W Street evangelist, Mr. and Mrs. H ilton; Italian work, Dr. A. Perazz Professor B. F. Butts, the committ musical director, Mrs. Butts, Mr. A strong, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Ross, M Munro, Messrs. Roper, Glasco, F Butler, and Horace R. Baker. An teresting member of the party w Rev. Mr. Faust, a young preacher w when a boy, was one of our little gue at Mont-Lawn. He told the children his experiences and how the spirit influence of the Children's Home h been the means of turning him t Christian life. Superintendent Sm and Rev. Mr. Dame made interest and helpful addresses to the child and Professor Butts and his m quartette rendered several fine sel tions which pleased them greatly. Stearns, of the National Bible In tute, was also a visitor on the same and spoke to the children.

Appeals have been received fr many homes in poorer sections of city, where there are little ones w would greatly benefit by an outing Mont-Lawn. It is hoped that cont butions may come in sufficient volu to enable us to take many of th children this season. We are grate to all the good friends who have s in their gifts thus far. A number the contributors, who have been vis ing New York this summer, have sp a day at Mont-Lawn and have found a delightful experience.

TAKING THE GOSPEL TO THE CITY CROWDS

By DON O. SHELTON, President, National Bible Institute, New York

FOR the evangelizing of the many millions of non-Christian people in America, there is required an evangelistic crusade every day in the year. This is the conviction held by the National Bible Institute of New York. The mission of the Christian Church is to travel and cry out the Gospel. Church buildings should be centres from which evangelistic zeal radiates every day in the year. The lost, to be saved, must be sought.

When the Church goes with the Gospel, in prayer and in the power of the Holy Spirit, the unsaved multitudes will listen intently and reverently. That this is so, the National Bible Institute in New York has proven through outdoor evangelistic meetings, held daily and systematically, from April to October, during several seasons. Ninety evangelistic meetings are now being held each week under the direction of the Institute, sixty-nine outdoors and twenty-one indoors. All sorts and conditions of men, and many nationalities, are being reached in the meetings.

The hearts of the workers this year have been gladdened by evidences of lives transformed by the power of the Holy Spirit. The following instances will be of interest: The first is the story of the conversion of a man, who, from a park bench, and by way of the outdoor evangelistic meetings in Madison Square, followed by the influence of our Mission of the Living Waters, has been saved from the power of sin. Through the mission, he was able to secure a position where he has been earning a good salary, and since his conversion he has been one of the most efficient workers at the mission and in the outdoor evangelistic meetings. This is the story of his conversion:

"I was sitting on a park bench in Madison Square one day in September, 1909. I had once been prosperous, but because of dissipation lost all, and had become seemingly a hopeless wreck, ashamed to see or be seen by my friends, or those who were once my friends, but had deserted me because of my own acts; with hardly enough clothing to cover my body, getting a little sleep on a park bench at night, with a newspaper for covering; often going to sleep wishing that I might never wake up again in this world, but without hope of anything better in the next. While sitting there in this condition, I heard the sound of music, and looking around, I saw on the east side of the park a crowd gathered, and moved nearer to see what it was about. It was an outdoor evangelistic meeting, under the auspices of the National Bible Institute. As I approached, the music ceased and a man stepped upon a box and talked about Jesus, one who is mighty to save, and could save even such as I, in my helpless, hopeless condition. I went away in doubt; but the second and third day I went back. I was handed one of the hymn sheets they were using. I have it yet. On the back of this sheet was an invitation to come to the Mission of the Living Waters, 23 Delancey Street. Shortly after this I found myself in that mission, and there that night I heard a man, one who looked to be, and is, a solid, substantial business man, tell the story of his life, and his fall, and it seemed to me to be the story of my own life, until he told of his conversion. He told how God had wonderfully saved him and caused him to prosper, and there and then I asked God to save me as he had the man who had been telling the story. God heard my cry, and that night I found the Saviour about whom I had heard at the meeting at Madison Square; and when I went out of the mission that night Jesus went with me, and he has been going and coming with me ever since. He has been my constant companion, and, praise his name! he has promised never to leave nor forsake me. Now I am not only telling the story in the missions, but in churches, on the street corners, and in the shops."

President Don O. Shelton Addressing a Gospel Meeting in Madison Square

The far-reaching influence of the meetings is shown also by the effo of converts to lead other friends i the Christian life. On a recent eve ing one of the workers at the Madis Square meeting offered a hymn-she to a young Italian, who had been co verted during the meetings held la summer. With a smile, the young fo eigner refused the proffered sheet, sa ing that he had a number in h pockets. "I try to get other Italians sign them," he explained. There is blank space left on the last page the sheets used in these meetin where a man may make a definit written acceptance of Jesus Christ his Saviour, and this young Itali meant that he has been endeavoring induce others of his countrymen make the great surrender. A week lat the same convert came up to the san worker and handed him a hymn-she upon which, under the words, "I accep Jesus Christ as my personal Saviou and surrender my life to him," wa written the name of another Italia "He didn't know much about Jesus the young Christian said, "so I tol him all you told me and how happ Jesus had made me, and he said h wanted Jesus to make him happy, to So he signed this."

The ninety meetings are being hel at the heart of the business section o New York at noon, at Herald, Madiso and Union Squares, and in Harlem at night, at three points on the Bow ery, at Union and Madison Square and at two points in Harlem; on Sun days, several meetings are held wher the crowds can be reached. Christia friends in many States of the Unio have sent their contributions to fur ther this far-reaching evangelisti crusade. THE CHRISTIAN HERAL and its late owner, Dr. Louis Klopsch have given the work generous support There is now required $6,500 to con tinue the ninety evangelistic meeting each week to October 15. It is ou earnest hope that the work may b extended, rather than lessened, and th hearty co-operation through praye and gifts of every reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be gratefully welcomed. Contributions may be sen to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD or to Mr Hugh R. Monroe, treasurer Nationa Bible Institute, 156 Fifth Ave., N. Y

Mohammedanism's Spread in Africa

TO-DAY African Moslems number little less than sixty millions, about one-third of the total population. In South Africa they are almost unknown. From the Congo and Zambezi Rivers up to the lower edge of the Sudan they are in the minority; but the northern half of the continent is practically ruled by the Koran. This means that Mohammedanism is the dominant religious force in a territory approximately four thousand miles from east to west, and two thousand miles from north to south, including all Egypt, Tripoli, Algeria, Morocco, the Sahara, and the Sudan. Eight million square miles in Africa are now swayed by the faith of Mecca.

Mohammeddan Heaman

Bishop Hartzell startled his hearers at the Rochester Student Volunteer Convention when he said that more Africans had become Mohammedans in the last ten years than had been converted to Christianity in the last fifty years. Dr. Samuel M. Zwemer, in his address at the Chicago Men's National Missionary Congress, vividly portrayed the crucial situation in Africa, due to the aggression of Mohammedanism. The problem of heathen Africa is rapidly dissolving into the far more difficult problem of Islamized Africa. This problem is a grave one in West Africa, and the coming years of missionary endeavor must witness signal victories if the Dark Continent is to be fully evangelized. The soldiers of the Cross are valiantly fighting the armies of the Crescent, but there must be a multiplying of prayers and sacrifices if this stupendous conflict is to be won for Christ. Mohammedanism asks very little of its African devotees, but the little that it does ask is sufficient to produce a defensive attitude towards Christianity. Confronting such a condition, one cannot help standing amazed at the tremendous task of the Gospel. What will be done by this generation to stem Islam's swelling tide?

When the English came to found a colony for freed slaves at Freetown, Sierra Leone, in 1787, the Moslem faith had preceded them. To-day the call to prayer goes forth from the minarets of the well-built mosques of the commercial, political, and religious centre of West Africa. In spite of its many Christian churches, schools and hospitals Freetown swarms with Mohammedans of different tribes. Five times a day from sunrise to two hours after sunset the muezzin, or crier, begins his summons to worship with the words, "God is great," uttered four times. Twice he says, "I testify that Mohammed is the apostle of God." At these times all Moslems, wherever they are, must show their loyalty by formal prayer.

In the interior of West Africa Mohammedanism holds strong sway. There the mosques are not as substantial as in Freetown, but they call the people to the same kind of worship. While journeying among some of the rivers in Sierra Leone, I came to a cluster of native villages. In one of them I found a small Mohammedan mosque. It had walls of hardened mud and a thatched roof. After we had taken off our shoes we passed through the door. The ground of the floor was smooth and marked with grooves. There were some mats and skins spread about. No doubt this crude temple has often been crowded with people attempting to worship a God of whom they have wrong conceptions, to utter prayers which they do not understand and to go through forms which are entirely unspiritual.

Mohammedan education is likewise deficient. It teaches forms without meanings. One Moslem teacher informed me that the Koran must be pronounced from beginning to end before a student would be taught the meaning of the smallest portion of it. There are some schools in Freetown where instruction is given in things outside of the Koran, but the latter is a sealed book to the vast majority of African Mohammedans. Most Mohammedan schools are held in houses and yards. The scholars in these are boys and they study the Arabic language. The characters, words and phrases are written upon smooth boards. Each boy studies by going over his lesson audibly.

Why is Islam such a persistent religion in spite of its weak efforts to train the mind and soul? That which favors Mohammedanism is its powerful appeal to the superstition and depravity of heathenism through charms, fetiches, slavery, polygamy, etc. The African puts on the gown of Islam not to get rid of his evil practices, nor even to hide them, but rather to dignify them if possible.

How shall the spiritual needs of Africa be supplied? The religion of Jesus Christ deals with human affairs in a very sympathetic way, and Africans, like true men, are able to appreciate this fellow feeling. The Gospel spreads its blessings through dispensaries, hospitals, industrial farms and manual training schools. The future progress of the race depends upon the cultivation of the elements of humanity it possesses. The negro in Africa has a strong susceptibility to training by education and this presents a rich opportunity to Christianity, which can do its most lasting work by getting control of African minds while they are yet in a plastic condition. Black boys and girls, though born in heathen homes, become keen students, and if properly trained, they will develop into strong leaders of their people.

With a proper working of mission fields heathenism and Mohammedanism will gradually but surely wane before the growing light of Christianity.

PEOPLE IN THE PUBLIC EYE

A NEW viceroy has been chosen by the British government to take charge of affairs in India, with the hope that he will be able to restore quiet to the turbulent and rebellious sections of Britain's Eastern Empire. The new viceroy is Sir Charles Hardinge, a statesman well versed in Indian affairs; in fact, his family for several generations has been closely connected with India. His grandfather was one of the noted governors in the early part of the nineteenth century, when the various races in India were still attacking one another on the least provocation and when the scarlet coat of the British infantryman was all that stood for law and progress. Sir Charles was born in 1858. He went to Harrow and to Cambridge University, and then entered the diplomatic service. He served at Teheran in Persia, and at St. Petersburg as secretary. Later in his career he was ambassador to Russia, and then became permanent under secretary of state for foreign affairs. He has received at least thirteen orders of knighthood from his own and foreign sovereigns, besides lesser decorations as a reward for his services of an international character. His appointment has given much satisfaction in Great Britain, where it is felt that the new viceroy must be a man of experience and resource, capable of meeting one of the most difficult problems Britain has had to face in India since the dark days of the mutiny.

IT is reported from London that as soon as the coronation takes place in May, the King will appoint his uncle, the Duke of Connaught, Governor-General of Canada, a post which the late King Edward was anxious to have him fill. The Duke, some years younger than Edward, was early destined for a military career, and he has been in more or less active service for four decades. He holds the grade of field marshal. Both he and his wife enjoy a wide social popularity in England. They have two daughters, one married to the Crown Prince of Sweden, while the other, Princess Patricia, is still unmarried. One son, Prince Arthur, is a major of cavalry. The Duke's last important post was the command of the British forces about the Mediterranean, with headquarters on the Island of Malta. Recently he has returned from hunting big game in Africa, where he spent some time in the country made familiar to him by the reports of Colonel Roosevelt's expedition. The Duke has often been spoken of as the handsomest member of the British royal family.

KNOWN far and wide as "The Mother of Missions," Mrs. William Butler celebrated her ninetieth birthday on July 30. Still vigorous physically and mentally, only a few weeks ago she spoke at the Sunday School Convention in Washington, D. C., where she attended as the oldest delegate. While a young woman, Mrs. Butler accompanied her husband, the late Rev. Dr. William Butler, known as the "pioneer missionary of the largest Protestant church in two fields—one on either side of the world" (India and Mexico), in 1856 to India. In their new home in Bareilly, she began visiting the women of the community and invited their daughters to her little home school. The Hindu women at first received her with scant courtesy. The first Christian message given by the Methodist Mission in a Hindu home was to fallen women. When the great Sepoy rebellion broke out, Dr. and Mrs. Butler were obliged to flee for their lives. During the following years she worked untiringly for the women and girls, and when she returned to America with Dr. Butler in 1865, the missionary field was well organized and equipped. Upon a second visit to India in 1883, Dr. and Mrs. Butler were received by a great company of orphan girls from the school at Bareilly, theological students, missionary families and members of Christian churches. "Mrs. Butler, after enthusiastically embracing every one of that long line of precious girls, stood still and wept with excess of joy," wrote Dr. Butler at the time; "it was all such a contrast to the days gone by when she and others in distress of soul made those earnest efforts to reach and teach even half a dozen girls in that city. Now, here was a crowd of happy Christian girls, welcoming her with songs of joy." In 1906, at the time of the "India Jubilee," Mrs. Butler, although then eighty-six, visited India again. One hundred and fifty thousand native Christians gave her a rousing reception, hailing her as "Empress of India Missions." Mrs. Butler's home is in Newton Centre, Mass., a suburb of Boston. Her daughter, Miss Clementina Butler, who lives with her and is associated with her in her missionary and literary work, says in a life of Dr. Butler: "To the unfailing courage and faith of his true 'helpmeet' he accorded a full share of whatever success crowned his life work."

Scientific "Guessing"

SOME of the scientists in the government employ at Washington have recently been endeavoring to compute the age of the earth. There is plenty of precedent, for it is a problem with which wise men of every age have wrestled from Job's day until now. These Washington investigators have supplemented the efforts of the earlier scientists and cosmogonists with researches of their own. They have before them the work of Leibnitz, who believed the earth to be an extinct sun vitrified; of Buffon, Lyell, Geikie, Solas, Dawson, Seeley and many other eminent men, some of whom flourished long ago and all of whom disagreed concerning the age of our planet. Lord Kelvin, half a century ago, put forth the opinion that it might be anywhere from 20,000,000 to 400,000,000 years old; but later in life, he cut his maximum estimate down to 40,000,000 years. Seventeen years ago, Dr. Walcott, of the Smithsonian Institution, reckoned that our globe was probably 70,000,000 years old. Professor Joly, eleven years ago, estimated the age of the sea at 80,000,000 years; while Solas quite lately reckoned that "old ocean" had rolled over its sandy bed for a period anywhere between 80,000,000 and 150,000,000 years. Some of our modern scientists, by reckoning the annual average saline deposit of the rivers and streams, have sought to reach a conclusion as to the length of time required to give the sea its present saltiness; but they too have been compelled to express their findings in figures so vast that they convey to the average mind no clear idea of time. And now our geological survey professors, having found the same problem of the earth's antiquity wholly beyond their skill, have resorted to "scientific guessing," like all of their forerunners. They "guess" that this world of ours has been in existence somewhere between 55,000,000 and 70,000,000 years. It's a good guess; unquestionably quite as good as any of the others. It would take a longer measuring line than science offers, however, to run back over the ages since that first dawn, when God said "Let there be light!" Wiser than all the scientists, the inspired writer of the Creation story in Genesis, knowing Him to whom "a thousand years are as but a day," did not "guess," but simply wrote: "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth." The old Bible is not a geological textbook, but it sets forth in strong, broad outlines the origin of things, which human science, with its obvious limitations, cannot hope to reach, far less controvert. Guesses as to the periods of time represented in the "Bible days" of Creation are futile, as the figures we have quoted show.

Since the dawn of human reason, four great problems have occupied the mind of man, viz.: The earth; the heavens above; God the Creator, and man and his destiny. These are still the master-studies of the race, and each successive age gives us deeper insight into them. It is a fine thing when men of intellect take up such studies earnestly and with reverence. The more they investigate in this spirit, the sooner will they trace clearly the lines of agreement that exist between science and the Bible, rightly interpreted, and the less need will there be for a resort to "guesswork," such as that we have seen in relation to the age of the earth.

The Progress of Latin America

FEW of us realize the wonderful progress being made by the nations south of us, which are classed as Latin America, and the report of Director Barrett of the Bureau of American Republics may be classed as an "eye-opener." In 1909 the report shows that they did a foreign business of $30 per capita, compared to the $3 per capita of Japan. The total reaches the amazing figure of two billion, one hundred and twenty-seven million, three hundred and one thousand dollars. The balance in trade was in favor of the South American countries. It is interesting to note that the bureau at Washington was responsible for fifty-two millions of new trade. Our country buys one-fourth of their products and sells it one-fourth of what is purchased from outside. This trade doubles in ten years.

The Pan-American Conference, at which the report was read, is being held in Buenos Ayres, Argentina, a city referred to recently by Sir John Benn as the Paris of the South. It is wealthy, and the architecture is of a high order. Signs of culture are seen on every hand. He voiced his surprise and said we must rearrange our ideas on South America. He said Argentina seemed reserved and equipped by nature to feed the rest of the world. France, alive to the growing importance of South America, has opened an exhibition of applied arts in Buenos Ayres, and other nations are seeking its trade. While our own is satisfactory, we shall find that at no distant day we can have even better markets in the South than some lands which we now think are better customers. The way in which the Latin Americans have joined us in the great work of developing our mutual interests is a good indication of their belief in the honesty of our intention and a desire for peaceful relations among themselves.

Choose the Right Road

TO every life there comes a testing time, when two roads are open to us—one right, the other wrong. Necessity, hard and uncompromising, forces us to the wrong road; danger, loss, even death appear to lie the other way. Are we, then, forced to sin? This is a question frequently asked by readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. When Palissy, the Huguenot potter, was lying a prisoner in the Bastile for his adherence to the Protestant faith, the King of France, who had great regard for him, visited him in his dungeon. He tried to move him by argument and persuasion and finally told him that if he did not comply with the established religion, he should be forced, however unwillingly, to leave him in the hands of his enemies. "Forced, sire?" replied the noble old man, with all the energy and fire of his earlier years. "This is not to speak like a king. But they who force you cannot force me. I can die." So Daniel, when he opened his window towards Jerusalem and still prayed and gave thanks to God, though he knew the den of lions awaited him. So Nehemiah, when he answered, "Should such a man as I flee? I will not go into the temple to save my life." So Peter and John, when threatened by the rulers and ordered to speak no more in the name of Jesus: "Whether it be right in the sight of God to hearken unto you rather than unto God, judge ye; for we cannot but speak the things which we have seen and heard." No, sin is never a necessity. Choose the right road and leave the rest with God.

The Great Heat Wave

ALL of the Eastern States will remember for some time the "hot spell" which started in a day or two after the celebration of the glorious Fourth and continued week in and week out until it seemed as if the limit of physical endurance had been reached. New York suffered severely, as it always does when the sun really decides that it will keep its rays at work in the crowded streets, where it is soon assisted by the radiation from the high buildings and the sidewalks. On Monday, July 25, the hot wave claimed thirteen lives; the number of those so badly affected that they died within a comparatively short time is not included in this number. Prostrations were numerous, and the clang of the ambulance was constantly heard as it hastened to some spot where a policeman had dismounted by the side of a limp form on the sidewalk. Many cases of exhaustion and sunstroke were privately treated by physicians and in drug stores.

The rush to the beaches has not been exceeded in recent years. All of the rolling stock that could be brought into service was put on the lines running to Coney Island, and the people packed the cars and hung to the posts until all that could be seen of the cars were roof and wheels. Four hundred thousand people went to Coney on one day, and a crowd of from one to two hundred thousand was not unusual. The motto with most people seemed to be "Coney or Die," and many were so exhausted when they got there that it seemed as if they were in danger of dying before the refreshing salt air could get in its work. There the police had their hands full looking after exhausted people. Thousands who could afford to go to a greater distance went to Atlantic City and other coast resorts, where they found every train filled with refugees from Philadelphia and points further west.

It is a remarkable fact that, while we have been suffering from the heat, Europe has been complaining of an unusually cold summer. Our thermometers have been ranging from eighty-five to a hundr , while over there the mercury has refused to go mu above fifty.

Standing for Principle

IN a recent issue, replying to a reader's questi , we stated in THE MAIL-BAG that we knew of daily newspapers which absolutely refuse liqu advertisements. We are glad to be undeceived this point, and to learn that there are several da publications whose conductors illustrate the m practical advocacy of sober citizenship by excludi liquor and doubtful advertisements. One of these the Evening Dispatch of Wilmington, N. C., edi by Mr. R. P. McClannery. Another is the Witn of Montreal, Canada. The Atlanta (Ga.) Georg is a third. The Fort Wayne (Ind.) Sentinel, edi by Mr. E. A. K. Hackett, and the Reading (P. Herald, Mr. E. M. McCormick, proprietor, make the total of a very interesting and unique quint. Besides there are the Salem (Mass.) Evening Ne; the Omaha (Neb.) Daily News; Lincoln (Ne Evening News and State Journal, and the Richmo Virginian. The Daily News of London, Engla , belongs to the same independent class of clean, p gressive journals. All honor to these valiant a self-sacrificing newspapers, but the list rema wofully small. In view of this disparity, would it n be good tactics for our temperance friends to tu their batteries of persuasion on the daily press u the little band becomes a substantial phalanx say, fifty? This should not be an impossible ta , and it is certainly one well worth trying. As ourselves, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD never publish such advertisements.

General Notes

—THE UNITED STATES STEEL Corporation has eclipsed its remarkable record by showing earnings during the three mon ending June 30, of $40,170,960, being more than $10,000, greater than in the same period last year.

—IN THE LATEST battle in Nicaragua, Estrada won w seemed almost a decisive victory. The Madriz forces were gaged by the Estradists at Comolapa and after a half-day fi were completely routed. Five hundred are reported killed wounded.

THE GREAT Krupp gun works in Germany have greatly increa their working force lately. There are now at the Essen wo 68,905 men, 7,500 working machines, 2,690 electric motors, 554 steam engines, and the steel output as well as the num of tests made with high-power projectiles on steel plates larger than any previous year.

—MUCH DEPENDS upon the point of view. A contempor tells of an old farmer who, when asked what he would d wealth came to him unexpectedly, replied: "Why, I'd sell old farm, and retire to the city and lead a quiet life." urban dweller reverses this viewpoint of course and ideali life in the country. Perhaps the explanation is to be found the fact that most people want "something else" than w providence has assigned them, although they are unwilling confess it.

—IN AN INTERESTING article in the World's Work, Profes J. P. Norton quotes the late Professor W. G. Sumner of Y as giving a somewhat startling prediction concerning the fut of the Republic. "As a nation," he said, "we are now enter the glory period. I don't like to see the glory period, becaus brings in grave dangers of corruption and extravagance wh ultimately have ruined all the republics of the past. I do believe the Republic will last longer than 1950. We are on threshold of very great wars, and the possibilities of trouble the East are tremendous."

National French Celebration

THE Bastile played an important part in French history from the day it was started by King John adding two towers to the gate of St. Antoine. In 1369 Charles V. had it converted into a regular bastile or fort, by adding six more towers and uniting them by massive curtain walls of stone. About it was a ditch twenty-five feet wide filled with water. This form it retained until its destruction during the French Revolution. Several times it was the place of refuge for French sovereigns when enemies were battering the gates of Paris. In the numerous civil wars of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries it was a bone of contention, and rival parties fought fiercely for its possession. Gradually it became more of a prison than a fortress, though it never entirely lost its original character. According to tradition the first incarcerated within its gray towers was the builder himself, Hugues Auberiot. Sometimes it was filled with prisoners of two classes, one detained on grounds of precaution and whose imprisonment depended on the will of the king; the other was composed of those who were charged with a specific crime and who were to be tried in the regular way. Until a man's guilt was proved he was allowed certain liberties. Among its most famous prisoners were the Man in the Iron Mask and Marshal Richelieu. At the outbreak of the Revolution it was attacked by the Parisians and carried by assault on July 14, 1789. The garrison fought gallantly, but were overpowered. Only seven prisoners were found. It was razed to the ground and a large bronze column now marks the site, often called the Column of July. The date of July 14 is observed as a holiday in Paris and in some other French towns. The Bastile stood in the French mind for oppression, and its destruction was the expression of their hatred of it. How swiftly has oppression been driven away from the nations of the earth in our time! Almost nowhere on the earth is absolute despotism permitted to exist. Freedom in France and everywhere is illustrated in the word of the prophet:

For thou hast broken the yoke of his burden and the staff of his shoulder, the rod of his oppressor. (Isa. 9:4.)

New Explosive Safe

In Melrose, Conn., there is being fitted a building for a new explosive, which is said to be more effective than any of the compounds of nitro-glycerine and yet perfectly safe to handle. This new substance can be hammered or put in the fire without producing an explosion. It is called carlsonite, after Professor Carlson, the Norwegian electro-chemist who invented one of the chief ingredients. W. Harcourt Palmer, a British engineer who is to have charge of the manufacture of this substance, recently took a carlsonite cartridge in his left hand, held a loaded rifle up to within six inches of it, and fired a bullet through the cartridge; this developed heat and concussion, two chief factors of explosion, but no explosion came. Had the substance been dynamite he would have been blown to atoms. On the Panama Canal work, where carlsonite has recently been successfully tested, a mule and a dray carrying a lot of it fell over a bridge to the rocks below. The driver ran off at his best speed, fearing an explosion that did not come. Carlsonite requires a special cap to explode it, and then it will only explode when the gases are in close confinement. It is likely that good use of this new explosive will be made in the art of war. After having mentioned the shields, spears, helmets, bows, slings, etc., used in contests against enemies, there is the record of engines of destruction invented by cunning men, as instruments of warfare.

And he made in Jerusalem engines, invented by cunning men, to be on the towers and upon the bulwarks, to shoot arrows and great stones withal. (II. Chron. 26:15.)

Kindness Wins Fortune

About twenty years ago a poor teamster who was down and out and could get no credit for hay and oats for his horses, was told by a young man, a clerk in a store, to cheer up and take a new grip on things, as he would let him have all of the horse feed he wanted on credit, and he would become personally responsible to the proprietor, and trust his honesty to pay the debt. That poor teamster struck oil and became Jack Ennis, the millionaire. He has just died at Corpus Christi, Tex., leaving a will in which it is stipulated that his wife shall have use of his fortune during her life, but at her death it must all go to Boyce Rankin, the young man who had really given him his start in life, and to his wife in equal parts. The young man did not expect any return for his deed, and he is now astonished beyond measure at his financial good fortune. No one can tell what plentiful harvests of reward will spring out of the seed of love. Hope of reward is an inferior motive to duty, and yet returns of infinite value are sure to follow deeds of love to our fellow men out of loyalty to our Master.

For thy work shall be rewarded, saith the Lord. (Jer. 31:16.)

Glacier Returns Bodies

Within the past fifty years five hundred tourists and guides have perished on Mont Blanc and the body of every one has been brought down on its slow journey of forty years' duration with the glacier on its movement to the sea. Forty years ago the 7th of next September, John C. Randall of Quincy, Mass., Dr. James B. Bean of Jonesboro, Tenn., and the Rev. George McCorkindale of Scotland, with a number of guides, were lost in a snow storm on Mont Blanc. On the 16th of the month a rescuing party found Mr. McCorkindale and two of the guides about 750 feet from the summit; about 300 feet higher they came upon Mr. Bean and another guide seated, the former with his head supported by one hand and his elbow on a knapsack. They hunted in vain for Mr. Randall and the rest of the guides. For four decades Mr. Randall's body has lain in a slow-moving coffin of ice, progressing inch by inch a few hundred feet each year; about him, entombed in ice, are five guides faithful to the last, escorting him back to Chamonix, the place from which they started forty years ago. The Bossons glacier will give up its dead this year within a few days, or weeks at most, of the anniversary day, September 7. Four children await the return of the body of their father. Mr. Randall's widow died in 1891, but Miss Edith Randall, the second child, twice has been abroad to look with awe on the slow-moving ice tomb of her father. The delivery of this body from its tomb of ice after these many years and its reception at the hands of loved ones reminds us of the surrender the grave must make through Christ's resurrection and the happy meeting of loved ones in the life beyond.

I will ransom them from the power of the grave; I will redeem them from death; O death, I will be thy plagues; O grave, I will be thy destruction. (Hosea 13:14.)

Child Hero in Wreck

Samuel Wayne Gayrigues, a boy seven years of age, of Columbus, O., was caught in a fearful railroad wreck the other day. His left arm was torn from its socket, mangled to shreds, and his right leg shattered in many places. He thought not of himself, only of his father and mother, who were on the train and whose lives, unknown to him, had been crushed out by the collision of the two trains. Lying on the floor in the depot, he begged his rescuers to leave him and go to his parents and help them. "Find mamma and papa. Go look for them. Oh, do you think they are hurt? Bring them to me," he repeated, over and over. The rescuers found the dead bodies of father and mother. A hundred feet from the track lay the mother's hand bag, in which was found the picture of her baby boy who had called for her. The physician offered the boy a swallow of whisky. The little lips compressed and the flask was withdrawn. "No, I'd rather die first than take whisky," the boy said to Rev. H. G. Smith, a Lutheran minister who knelt by his side in the depot. It is impossible for us to conceive of a more beautiful and pathetic love of child for parent than that exhibited by this dear little boy. His Quaker parents had taught him everything that was sweet, pure and lovely, and had impressed the lesson of total abstinence upon him so sensibly that it made a moral hero of him. His example will be a model and inspiration to thousands of children in our land. The moral courage of the boy was in imitation of one of olden times.

But Daniel purposed in his heart that he would not defile himself with the portion of the king's meat, nor with the wine which he drank; therefore he requested of the prince of the eunuchs that he might not defile himself. (Dan. 1:8.)

New Elements Discovered

Professor Muthman of Munich announced the other day at a congress of German chemists that Dr. Auer von Welsbach of Vienna had discovered six new elements. The professor made mention of the discoveries of this Austrian chemist while he was reading his own paper to the congress on "Rare Earths." He said Dr. Von Welsbach had succeeded in separating terbium and thulium, previously believed to be elements, into two constituents each, and dysprosium and gadolinium, two other rare elementary substances, into three each. The number of elementary "rare earths" has thus been increased from sixteen to twenty-two. It will be remembered that last year Dr. Von Welsbach, simultaneously with the French scientist Urbain, discovered that ytterbium, for thirty years believed to be an element, was divisible. Since 1878 the Viennese savant has added ten elements to those known to science, a record for any single inventor, in recognition of which the congress of German chemists sent him a telegram of congratulation. When the old people of to-day were children, the teachers taught that there were only a few original elements and that everything in nature was a compound of them. Science with its investigation and discrimination has been multiplying the numbers extensively. All material substances are compounds; spiritual existences are not compounds. They are uncompounded and unmixed entities; they cannot be divided into parts. Nothing can be added to or taken from them. Currents of thought may flow through them. Sentiments may be entertained by them. They may mingle in companionships, but they remain the everlasting ego or self of being. The Bible story of creation tells how God took "rare earths" and made man's body of compound elements, and then breathed into that body, out of his own nature, the uncompound essence of the human soul.

And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life: and man became a living soul. (Gen. 2:7.)

CHATS ON MY COOL VERANDA

The Charm of a Rainy Day

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

EVERY woman knows how delightful is the opportunity for uninterrupted work that comes to her when it really settles down in the morning for a long rainy day. Something intensely restful and comforting enfolds one when the skies are gray, the clouds are low and the silver lances of the rain are seen glittering against the background of the trees. The patter of rain upon the roof is a music that cheers the heart with its gentle monotonous melody. A long spell of rain lasting for days together and reminding of the deluge loses this quality of restfulness, if it occur in a climate where sunshine obtains most of the time. Dwellers in parts of the world where a rainy season is anticipated with pleasure are not among those to whom this bit of talk is addressed. They prepare to go forth as usual, call on their friends, tramp about in the wet and carry an umbrella as a matter of course for six or eight weeks of constant dampness. Rainy days becoming their ordinary appointment cease to exercise the spell of the rainy day with us who have so much brightness and sunshine that now and then we are glad of the relief of grayness and shadow.

What may we do on a rainy day? If we have children who are to be amused, we have made provision for them in the way of paper dolls, story books and indoor games. We may let the little girl help us when we roll out biscuits or stir up a cake for luncheon. A child is never happier than when allowed to fuss with the dough, to stir something up with a spoon and to bake her own cakes in her own little pans. Fortunate are the children who possess an attic, a barn or a lumber room where they may do as they please on a rainy day. Last summer a large group of children staying together in a country inn were amused upon a rainy morning by the ingenuity of a lady who selected a small boy and a small girl and successively dressed them in a dozen characters and sent them over the house with slips of paper on which messages were written. The properties at her command were very few, but with picture hats, waterproof cloaks, fans, parasols and a gold-headed cane, she produced remarkable transformations.

A rainy day is a good time for rummaging in the trunks where last year's clothing has been packed, deciding what to do with Mary's outgrown cloak and Johnnie's last year's suit. The articles that are to be furbished up and sent away in barrels and boxes to orphanages and Homes for the Friendless, the dresses that are to be turned and freshened for school wear, and the alterations that are to be made in this or that, may be arranged for on a rainy day. No one is likely to invade the privacy of a garret or to ring the door-bell at all when the rain is coming down in torrents.

If correspondence is in arrears get your letters off your mind on a rainy day. There are always dear ones to whom you should write, friends near at hand and friends across the sea to whom you should send a letter. Look over your accounts, and if anything has been neglected, take the rainy day to make amends. File away your receipts and put your housekeeping books into the order with which a merchant keeps a ledger and strikes a balance.

Something to Interest Mothers Once in a while a fortunate genius invents something so obviously essential to comfort and household luxury that the wonder grows why it has never been thought of before. This is the age of mechanical devices from airships to rolling pins, and it is quite in the order of natural law that an arrangement should at last be devised for the comfort of mothers. If any one should be helped it is the mother of a babe who must be fed and cared for by rule, both day and night.

From the earliest ages until to-day the mother has had to rise from her bed at midnight, lift up her nursling and put it back again in the crib. Now there is no occasion for her to be thus inconvenienced. Here is an adjustable crib which may stand on four legs, may be wheeled about as a baby carriage and at night may be suspended at the foot of the mother's bed. If the baby wakes the mother pulls a cord, and presto, the baby's bed is within her grasp. You would have to see it yourself to comprehend how perfect the contrivance is and how well adapted to insure a night's rest for baby and mother. The whole thing is so happily planned that one cannot imagine it to have been the idea of a mere man. Some clever woman may have suggested its creation. The Taylor Nursery Baby Bed Company have an invention of which they may be proud.

FUN IN THE BARN

Here are little friends together,
Some in fur and some in feather,
All of them in summer weather
Having lots of fun.

Choose a barn from all the places,
Beckoning these little faces
With its wide and airy spaces
Both in rain and sun.

Your Boy's Vacation The long summer vacation hailed by your boy with acclamation is not an unmixed source of satisfaction to you if you desire a quiet house and are opposed to the rough play in which boys take pleasure. City boys, who have no play place but the street or a small back yard, are greatly to be pitied when the school doors are closed. The usual sports dear to the boyish heart are forbidden in tov They may not play ball, because they may bre windows or hit passersby. If they engage in noi play, they incur the censure of the neighborho Unless a boy can have some outing in the count in his vacation, he will miss the best part of it. Y should strain a point, wherever you are, to send t growing lad somewhere in the open country.

God Be With You Till We Meet Again There are certain hymns fraught with sacred associatio and exquisite memories that t mere mention of them thrills t heart with gladness. Perhaps the first time y joined in the inspiring chorus beginning "God with you till we meet again," was at the close o summer convention. You can shut your eyes a see in a picture a great auditorium, with doors a windows open, a platform on which sit dist guished speakers and a floor space r ing gently so that every one may s the seats crowded with happy-looki people who have spent days togetl in studying the Bible, listening to e quent addresses and uniting in pra and praise. Very likely a sea bre wanders through the room and y can hear the distant booming of t surf. How the great breakers roll upon the yellow sand, the wh horses of the sea of which Homer sa and which eternally keep up th wonderful march. The conventi may have been held in a smiling val rimmed about by green hills, wh reaches of a shining river could glimpsed through the groves. He birds warbled and the breeze ma music in fields of ripening grain.

The days have gone by hallow and sweet. Youthful lovers ha plighted their troth, and those w had long been wedded have been dra into closer fellowship. The time h come for saying good-night and go by until another year. "God be wi you till we meet again," on earth or heaven, till we meet at Jesus' feet. there in the whole round of hymnolo anything lovelier?

An Old-Fashioned Garden Grandmother's g den was gay wi flox, peonies and r bon grass, with roses and day lili verbenas and lady slippers, each flow in its own season. Flowers grew f grandmother, who never seemed to ha any trouble over her garden. Occ sionally her husband or son wou spade up the ground for her and e rich the earth with manure at h bidding, but for the most part she d the work of planting and transplan ing, weeding and watering with h own hands. Her flowers seemed bloom because they loved her a because they knew the sunshine w bright and the dews were soft and t showers a delight. Daffodils, nastu tiums, sweet peas, whatever gran mother wanted she had in her garde Her flowers were not in stiff rectang lar beds; they were sometimes masses and sometimes in a jumble of sweet wi ness and gay confusion, but they were fragra and sturdy and delicate and exquisite, and the were always plenty of them. No child peeri through the fence reached out a little hand in va for a flower. If any one was ill, grandmother h flowers to send her, and if there were a coming-c party for a young girl or bridal bells were about ring, grandmother's garden was called upon to cc tribute to the decorations. When death snatch away a little one or gently closed the eyes of tired pilgrim, grandmother had white flowers a sweet geranium leaves to send to the house mourning. Of all the flowers in her garden no were sweeter than the dear old-fashioned pi with its spicy breath and fringed petals.

THE MISFIT

By E. RYERSON YOUNG, JR.

'['M Nehemiah Rockwell, your new preacher," he announced, at the door of the church steward to om he had been directed.

'You're welcome," said the worthy ward, who had tilted his chair back the wall and was chewing a toothh after eating his five o'clock sup. "Where's your horse?"

He brought his chair square with t floor and waited for the answer.

'My horse?"

'Yes."

'Why, I haven't any. I walked from t cars."

'Well," said the steward tilting his ir back to the wall, as there was no se to put away, "you will have to one. You cannot do the work on ts six-appointment mission without horse. It's more than sixty miles und."

While in sea-girt Newfoundland, hemiah Rockwell had heard the call o the church for volunteer home ssionaries. Now, the hardy fisherm of Newfoundland, in their rocky i and wave-lashed coast, fed by the rvests of the sea, think that there is nother land so favored, or so blessed oGod. They know the sea, their boats al their Bibles. Of other things they metimes hear and, after puzzling o r how they work and how people ther with them, think that they can be of much consequence because ty are not used or needed in Newfndland. Spiritual zeal and sanctifition should not be confounded with rldly knowledge, technical skill or ecutive ability. Their full glory appers in men blessed with the latter ces and accomplishments; but they a also found where the minds of men a cramped by ignorance, conceit and nional bigotry. Nehemiah was a d specimen of the latter and well ebited the circumscribed life and ught of his ancestors as with holy zl he had left his native land and, othe order of the church, had gone to Vodhill Mission.

The five-mile walk from the little rway station had been full of charm f him. The woods under the gentle hd of June had blossomed abundtly and were rich in foliage and flver; the little lakes shone like polied silver and the only clouds that flked the purest of blue skies were fcy and white. Feasting his eyes un these glories, he had thanked God or and over again for bringing him tsuch a beautiful land. Then he had wdered what kind of people dwelt aidst such beautiful surroundings.

The scattered settlers in that new cntry were too busy with ax, hoe and pw, in making homes and living, to pse and admire the glories of nate. Pork, potatoes and cabbages ty were seeking, with an occasional dh of fish, partridge and venison. Hrdy, uncouth but warmhearted, they we fair specimens of the pioneer setts who brave the unbroken forest a pave the way for advancing civilizion. While they could not appreche the natural beauties of their surrndings, there were some souls who rched to heights eternal, who worsped God and longed for pastoral ce and leadership to perfect their fh and help their neighbors.

The holy zeal that burned in the crch and thrust men out to work in tl Master's vineyard was not active eugh to supply the present demand wh home preachers. The Macedian cry was, therefore, sounded, and hce our volunteer from the fisherm's home, dear old Newfoundland.

Nehemiah Rockwell stood in the stvard's doorway somewhat dumbfnded at this first greeting by his n parishioners. He had thought tlt his announcement of himself as tl r pastor would have brought them to their feet, cap in hand, to wait on him. But such coolness! Surely this people did not know how to welcome a minister! And then, that question about a horse!

"You'll come and have a bite, won't you?" said the housewife, hospitably.

"That's right," added the husband. "Come right in and make yourself at home. We'll lend you old Dolly for to-morrow, but after that you must make other arrangements for a horse."

"Thank you," said Nehemiah, as he entered. He put his hat on a peg, his satchel in a corner, and, in the easy, kindly atmosphere, forgot all about that nightmare of a horse.

Sabbath morning broke in splendor over the land. The verdant hills shone in glory and the myriad leaves, in every shade of living green, danced in the gentle breeze. Nehemiah Rockwell had arisen early and gone out to commune with God and worship him amidst his glorious creations.

By the aid and instructions of his steward, the young preacher had drawn a map of the mission, of its roads and churches, and he thought that he had that matter well in hand. The worthy steward led out Dolly, a stout, serviceable horse, that knew how to plow and how to save her feet in traveling the rocky, root-infested paths of the country.

With some awkwardness, Nehemiah took his seat in Dolly's saddle and started up the north road. He was full of exclamations of wonder and praise of the glories that surrounded him. The horse was as wonderful as anything else. She was almost as good as a sailboat. He had now joined the band of noble circuit riders, of whom he had read, but had little appreciated what their real experiences were. This was glorious!

Dolly took things easily and jogged along. Nehemiah soon felt his seat uncomfortable and brought Dolly to a walk. Then he got off her back and walked by her side for about a mile. Noticing by his watch that time was flying, Nehemiah thought that he had better remount and hasten. Leading Dolly to a stump he attempted to regain his seat. Dolly seemed to know what kind of a man she had to deal with and so played with him some time ere she allowed him to mount. Nehemiah was, therefore, quite warm when he sat back in the saddle, and so he took off his coat and fastened it in front of him. As the breeze fanned his cheeks and puffed his shirtsleeves, he thought it very refreshing. Coming to a marked turn he consulted his watch and map. He had consumed nearly all his time and was not more than half way!

"'Drop your sail!' shouted Nehemiah"

He tried to make Dolly go near a tree while he secured a branch for a whip, but Dolly would not allow this. Finally he got off, broke a limb and, after trimming away the leaves, he remounted with better success than on the previous occasion. Dolly had her eye on that switch.

Nehemiah shook it at Dolly. She laid back her ears, flipped her tail, but did not increase her speed. Nehemiah struck her, and in protest Dolly whisked her tail more vigorously. Nehemiah applied the whip in real earnest, and Dolly, losing patience, sprang into a gallop.

This was what Nehemiah wanted when he whipped Dolly, but having attained the goal of his ambition he wished that he hadn't succeeded. He did not know how to master the situation. His feet slipped out of the stirrups. Backwards and forwards he bounded on the saddle. He lost the use of the reins and gripped Dolly wildly by the mane. Finally he threw his long arms around her neck and clung there for dear life. Dolly plunged wildly on, the pounding weight on her back causing her as much alarm as her gait caused the rider. Down the road, through the woods, past the little log houses and clearings, they dashed. Then on to the log schoolhouse, where the morning service was to be held.

Here, as in other backwoods places, the male portion of the congregation never think of entering the place of worship until the preacher arrives. They were all seated on stumps, fallen logs, or on the grass around the door, talking of the weather, crops, tanbark peeling and hunting. Past them, in good John Gilpin style, Dolly and Nehemiah galloped. The laugh and shout came readily to their lips. Two of the young men sprang into their saddles and hastened to catch the runaway. Being lighter and fresher, these horses soon overtook Dolly. The men caught her reins, eased her pace and finally brought her to a standstill. Nehemiah regained his seat and tried to regain his breath. His shaken mind was struggling for an excuse of the situation.

"The—the horse didn't fit, did it, boys?" he stammered.

The young woodsmen looked at him in grim amazement and could not trust themselves to speak. But when they saw the preacher safely inside the schoolhouse, they turned and ran into the woods. They hugged each other and danced and laughed, as over and over again they repeated Nehemiah's words and mimicked his tone and stuttering: "The—the horse didn't fit, did it, boys!" They nearly took a fit themselves and it was with very wet eyes and red faces that they met the dispersing congregation. Some of the people looked suspiciously at the young men and attempted to smell their breaths.

"Our breath's all right," said they mockingly. "How did the sermon fit?"

"He's a grand preacher, that!" was the prompt reply.

"We're so glad," said Steele as soberly as he could, but Woods could hardly contain his laughter; his face, consequently, becoming vividly red.

"What's the matter with you fellows, anyway?" was the imperious demand.

"Get that preacher out of the way and we'll tell you; and do it quickly or we'll burst."

These remarks roused the people's curiosity and so they lingered. Nehemiah felt complimented as he thought that they had all remained to become acquainted with him. Preachers little know what holds some congregations together. In shaking hands all around he came to Bill Woods and Tom Steele, who tried to avoid him, but he met them face to face and gave each a hearty handgrip that surprised them because of its strength and warmth. Finally some of the older people carried the preacher away for dinner and then the young men told their story. The people laughed as only goodhearted, innocent people can laugh.

Before long Nehemiah heard of it; but, to his chagrin, he found that it was only a sample of the many laughs that he was continually giving this people. The shell of his past life was crumbling all around him and he was seeing a new, big, strange world, and,

The Howard Watch

ON the Ship's Bridge all over the Seven Seas — you'll find the HOWARD Watch. Not only in American ships. The HOWARD is the finest practical watch in the world.

The Navigating Officer guides the ship. Observing the altitude of the sun or a heavenly body with his sextant, and instantly noting the time on his watch, he gets the data for working out the position of his ship—its longitude and latitude.

His watch must run second for second with the ship's chronometers. A few seconds' error in time may make all the difference between a free channel under keel and a sunken reef.

The HOWARD is the closest rating watch in the world. The HOWARD position adjustment holds good through the rolling and pitching of the steamer.

A HOWARD Watch is always worth what you pay for it.

The Price of each HOWARD is fixed at the factory and a printed ticket attached—from the 17-jewel (double-roller escapement) in a "Jas. Boss" or "Crescent" gold-filled case at $40 to the 23-jewel in a 14-k. solid gold case at $150.

Not every jeweler can sell you a HOWARD Watch. Find the HOWARD Jeweler in your town and talk to him. He is a good man to know. Drop us a postal card, Dept. W, and we will send you a HOWARD book of value to the watch buyer.

THE VERY TIME

When Powerful Food Is Most Needed.

The need of delicate yet nutritious food is never felt so keenly as when a convalescent gets a setback on account of weak stomach. Then is when Grape-Nuts shows its power, for it is the most scientific and easily digested food in the world.

"About a year ago," says a Kansas woman, "my little six-year-old niece, Helen, left the invigorating and buoyant air of Kansas, where all her life she had enjoyed fairly good health, to live in the more quiet atmosphere of Ohio. She had a complete change of diet consisting of a variety of food, and of course a change of water, somehow she eventually contracted typhoid fever.

"After a long siege her case seemed hopeless, doctors gave her up, and she was nothing but skin and bones, couldn't eat anything and for weeks did not know even her father or mother. Her parents, wishing to get something delicate and nourishing, finally hit upon Grape-Nuts food for her and it turned out to be just the thing.

"She seemed to relish it, was soon conscious of her surroundings and began to gain health and strength so rapidly that in a short time she was well, playful and robust as if she had never been ill.

"We all feel that Grape-Nuts was the predominating factor in saving the sweet little girl's life."

Ambition May Be Holy*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

"AND as Jesus was going up to Jerusalem." Jericho was in the deep gorge wherein was the Dead Sea and the fords of the Jordan, while Jerusalem was on the mountain tops, between fifteen and twenty miles distant.

It was a hot and dusty way as with a party of Sunday School pilgrims we traversed it in 1904. The thermometer registered one hundred and twenty-nine degrees, and the road had the appearance and quality, as might have been expected, of the contents of several lime kilns, which had been scattered along the way, several inches deep. And the stones were so many and so large that to ride in a carriage was torture and much of the way walking on foot was to be preferred.

On the Way to the Passover

Jesus many times went back and forth over this way, but on the day in question he and his disciples were going up to Jerusalem to be present at the great feast of the Passover. And the road was full of joyous travelers on their way to the feast. Jesus, for some reason best known to himself, called his disciples aside out of the throng. We must think that it was to prepare their minds and hearts for the solemn crisis, even his crucifixion. At least it was to draw them aside from the throng, and create in their spirits a solemn atmosphere.

"Then came to him the mother of the sons of Zebedee," and these were James and John. She came with a mother's longing in her heart for the advancement of her sons. Can we blame her? That she asked amiss may have been her mistake rather than a sin. She certainly did not comprehend what she asked, for she had made the request that one son should sit on the right hand of Jesus and the other on his left in his kingdom. It was as if she had asked blessing for one, and cursing for the other; but she had not thought of it in that way, but only that both might have places of power and distinction.

"When the ten heard it, they were moved with indignation concerning the two brethren." Evidently the ten disciples supposed that the mother had made the request of Jesus by the suggestion of her two sons. Whether this was so or not, James and John had expressed themselves quite willing to share the joys and especially the sorrows of their Master, for when Jesus had asked them, "Are ye able to drink the cup that I am about to drink?" they had answered, "We are able." Then it was that the indignation of the disciples grew more intense.

"Jesus called them unto him." He gathered them close about him, and probably sat down in their midst, that he might teach them the true idea of greatness and supremacy.

How Real Greatness Is Attained

"Whosoever would become great among you shall be your minister," not to be served but to serve, was the principle by which greatness was to be obtained; not by self-serving, but by self-sacrifice; not to consider themselves but others. This was the key of the situation in the life of Jesus upon earth, and strangely enough in the nearly three years in which the disciples had mingled with him and labored with him they had failed to discover it. But they had to have at least one more lesson from Jesus to learn it, and that was given at the eating of the Passover supper on the Gethsemane night, when the disciples contended with each other about the places they should have at the table. On that occasion Jesus himself to[o] place of the servant and washed feet.

"And as they went out from Je[r] a great multitude followed t[h] Jesus had become well known b[y] wonderful words and works, so t[he] crowd immediately gathered abou[t] whenever he was seen. Some unc[on]edly were moved by curiosity, an[d] ers by a desire to obtain help Jesus.

The Blind Men by the Waysid[e]

"Two blind men sitting by the side cried out, Lord, have mer[cy] us." They heard him passing b[y] rather they heard the rush o[f] crowd, and knew that Jesus was to them. They knew even the moment of his passing, for wh[o] was nearest to them they made cry for help.

"What will you that I do unto [you]? This was the gracious reply of as he halted before them, and the halted, too, eager to see what would do.

"Lord, that our eyes may be ope[n]. Great was their faith, or they not have asked it. They had hea[rd] other blind eyes that he had op[ened] and had longed to meet him where. And now their chance come!

"And Jesus, moved with compa[ssion] touched their eyes." He might granted their request from the of the throng, but he chose to co[me] near that his gentle, loving fi[nger] should rest upon their very eyes. W[e] must believe that to the end of days they never forgot that tou[ch] it rested in benediction upon them for a moment.

"And straightway they re[ceived] their sight." Then the sigh[t] their benefactor dawned upon t[hem] He looked on them, and they look[ed] him! Oh beatific vision! An[d] crowd gazed, too, on him who h[ad] and on those who were healed, an[d] burst forth in tumultuous praise

"And followed him." There we[re] two men whose sight had been res[tored] They had no need any longer to [sit] the wayside to beg. And they j[oined] the happy throng on the way t[o] Passover at Jerusalem. We [must] think they followed Jesus so c[lose] that they either mingled with th[e dis]ciples or followed very near to [him] The crowd would sympathizingly [make] room for them.

The "Pillar Apostles"

A certain European prince is s[aid] have declared that his highest aml[ition] was to become famous without t[o] to be famous. Real fame com[es] those who faithfully do their du[ty] the environment where God has p[laced] them in this world.

"Pillar apostles" in the Chur[ch] their God is what the apostles [have] been called, and in this connectio[n we] are reminded of that old temple [called] the "Erechtheum" in Athens, [which] rests upon the shoulders of pond[erous] human figures cut in stone. It m[ay] considered typical of Judas that [one] of these figures was taken away vandal hand, but the temple did [not] fall! It is a fact that men and [women] only become great as they stand i[n the] places God has chosen for them. [We] read that God put into the mind[s and] hands of Tubal-Cain to work in [iron] and brass, so that he was able to [con]struct the wonderful work in gold[, silver] and copper, and to teach o[thers] the same, so that they might b[e his] helpers. To others God gave the p[ower] to fashion beautiful things in [em]broidery, so that the hangings o[f the] tabernacle and the sacred veil mig[ht be] made.

od is doing just this sort of thing fo men and women. Let those w are thus gifted in art, in letters, in usic, in crafts, praise not themse s, but God. Let them award to G the praise which men bestow upon th. Some one has said: "Be speci y upon the watch against those litt tricks by which the vain man se s to bring round the conversation to imself, and gain the praise or notic which his thirsty ears drink in so gr dily."

ven if praise comes unsought, it is w while men are uttering it, to guard yo self by thinking of some secret ca e for humbling yourself inwardly to rd God, thinking unto what these pl sant accents would be changed if al hat is known to God, and even to yo self, stood revealed to man. Pl e yourself often beneath the cross of alvary; see that sight of love and so ow; hear those words of wonder; lo at the eternal Son humbling himse there for you, and ask yourself as yo gaze fixedly on him, whether he wise only hope is in that cross of ab lute self-sacrifice and self-abasemet can have to cherish in himself on self-complacent action. Let the M ter's words ring in your ears: "H w can ye believe who receive honor on of another, and seek not the honor th cometh from God only?" "Boaster are cousins to liars," says the pr erb.

The Steps of Ambition

nother proverb says: "Contentm t is better than wealth." Ergasilus, th homeless and penniless parasite of lautus, claimed to be Luck, Gaiety, Sa ty and Joy, because he was conte ed, but far better than such conte ment would have been an ambition to e independent of others. Men have be too lavish of the lash on ambition, fo no man succeeds either in business or eligion without it. One of Shakespe e's characters says: "Ambition has tu two steps: the lowest blood, the hi est envy." It has many noble st s between these two extremes that le us to excellence of character and ac evement. The ambition whose m o is: "What thou wouldst highly that wouldst holily," is a noble ambition. There is, of course, an ambition like Richelieu's, "Breathing the air of hate and seeing daggers in the eyes of men," but there is also an ambition that breathes the air of prayer, and sees in humanity harvest fields for Christian effort; an ambition that works inward to renew us, and upward to make us Christlike, and outward to turn many to righteousness; an ambition that sings: "Nearer, my God, to thee," and prays, "I will not let thee go except thou bless me," and struggles to "comprehend with all saints what is the height and depth, and length and breadth of the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

In our hate of ambition's abuse, we have feared its use, but we need to learn that every passion in the human soul is given to lift us Godward, and to help the race in its long journey back to Eden. We should hate vain thoughts; we should be angry at wrong and sin not; we should cherish a "godly jealousy"; we should "covet earnestly the best gifts." These passions are our steeds, and God gave them to us to help us heavenward. As Christians then we should not be satisfied, but follow on, press on, strive on, to know Christ more, and pray on, lead on, speak on to taste and see the wonders of his grace.

A candid president of Brown University once said: "It was my misfortune that the most intimate of my friends, though pure in their lives and morally wholesome as associates, were low in their aims as scholars, satisfied with very little and very superficial work. They had been sent to college to prepare for the ministry. Selected and aided by beneficiary funds as 'candidates for the ministry,' they seemed to regard themselves as absolved from the duty of high aims as scholars, and dropped into the wretched cant of 'laying aside ambition as unworthy servants of the Lord.'" It is not this spurious discontent of ourselves that is to be commended, but rather that sort of discontent of ourselves which is prompted by the thought that the best we can do is poor enough for an offering to the Lord.

God's Reasonable Expectation*

HE obedience to the law of God demanded of every Christian, sounds like a simple thing, and so the prophet seems to consider it.

e says: "He hath shewed thee, O m , what is good; and what doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?"

ustice, mercy, humility. It seems as though any decently educated and ordinarily well-disposed person might be able to maintain within himself a spirit of justice, mercy and humility. nd yet justice is probably the most unattainable of all high attributes. It is said that few of our laws are entirely just; that governments find it impossible to conduct their operations justly, and that individuals are almost never just in their treatment of each other. e all know that the just man in every community shines forth like a star among his fellows. They carry their quarrels to him to settle. He decides concerning disputed boundary lines, matrimonial disagreements and the interpretation of ambiguous laws. He is revered by all.

erhaps the merciful man is almost as exceptional. Cruelty and brutality marked all of the earlier ages. Even in the ancient distinction between "gentle" and "simple," the "gentleman" was often far from merciful.

he great merciful movements of modern times here have been those of the two societies for the prevention of cruelty, first, to dumb animals; second, to children; and, last of all, the Anti-vivisection Society.

This excellent organization has for its object, not the suppression of vivisection, which has benefited mankind in many ways; but its regulation, so that only responsible persons shall be licensed to perform it; and that it shall be subject to inspection from authorized agents. At present, almost any one can open an establishment for vivisection; and no inspection is usually practised nor often allowed.

Of course, there are in every such movement a few extremists, who bring discredit upon their organization; but the main body of the anti-vivisectionists are reasonable and moderate.

Almost as rare a virtue as mercy is humility. This beautiful Christian grace is seldom rightly interpreted.

True humility does not consist in an utter absence of spirit—in the abject prostration of one's powers which was typified by that amusing creation of Charles Dickens, Mrs. Gummidge, who described herself as "a lone, lorn creatur' "; and by Uriah Heep, that arrant counterfeit of the truly " 'umble."

No; genuine humility consists in the subordination of a naturally high spirit to the will of God; of the bowing of a haughty and unbroken human will to the highest and best, from principle and from honest love. "Christ walked in a humility which was never self-degradation."

Perhaps we might properly paraphrase after Paul, Micah's great trinity, and say, "Now abideth justice, mercy and humility; but the greatest of these is humility."

Our Excellent Cooks At Your Service

We have an army of cooks here — experts in baking beans.

They are ready to save you the sixteen hours required to prepare this dish.

They are baking now for a million homes, so their service costs each but a trifle.

They will send the beans to you — ready to serve in a minute — as fresh as though baked that day. You can keep a dozen cans on the pantry shelf, ready for any emergency.

They bake in steam ovens, heated to 245 degrees. They bake in small parcels, so the full heat goes through.

Their beans are digestible—they don't ferment and form gas — because they apply over twice the heat that gets to the center of your baking dish.

Yet their beans are not crisped — not broken—because they don't use dry heat. They come to you nut-like, mealy and whole.

And they bake the tomato sauce into the beans to give a delicious zest.

They are dealing with Nature's choicest food — a food that is 84 per cent. nutriment. A food more nutritious than sirloin beef, and costing a third as much.

They prepare it far better than you can prepare it, because you lack all the facilities. They enable you to serve — without any trouble — the finest baked beans in the world.

Don't you think it would pay to let these cooks bake for you?

"The National Dish" Van Camp's BAKED WITH TOMATO SAUCE PORK AND BEANS "The National Dish"

Our process is the result of 49 years of experience. Our beans are Michigan beans—just the whitest and plumpest, picked out by hand. Our sauce is made of whole, solid tomatoes, ripened on the vines. It costs us five times what common sauce sells for.

Let no one convince you that common baked beans are like Van Camp's. They are not.

Three sizes: 10, 15 and 20 cents per can. (90)

NATIONAL Roller Bearing Carpet Sweeper

No matter whether a carpet or rug has long or short nap, the National adjusts itself to it automatically by slight handle pressure, and the genuine Chinese bristle rollers (the kind that never lose their "snap") get every scrap, speck and ravelling. Ideal for quick "brushing up" in dining room or sewing room; saves strength for general house cleaning.

Most convenient, because it has individual dump levers and instant brush release. Anti-tipping device prevents spilling.

The rubber tires on the brush rollers insure thorough and constant sweeping—no "skipping;" at the same time the improved roller bearings and perfect construction make the National the easiest running of all sweepers.

Handle cannot split or loosen; special dust pans will not rust. Every appliance for utility and convenience is found in the National Sweeper. Ask your dealer.

what was worse to him, he was in the midst of a people as narrow and ignorant, in a little different way perhaps, as the people he had left; and who laughed at his deeds, words and even questions.

The annual Sunday School picnic was due about four weeks after Nehemiah's arrival. Young fellows like Steele and Woods were not satisfied with the usual quiet event within the woods, with swings and races and ball-play. They had visited some outside places and the school in their opinion ought to have a real outing on the big lakes.

With great enthusiasm, decked in all their gala ribbons and new suits, the people, young and old, came by wagon and train to the lakes. There they met the big steamer and had a delightful sail through the islands to the picnic grounds at the Falls.

Not satisfied with the steamboat ride, Steele and Woods and another young man rented a sailboat and took their girls for a sail. The deceptive breeze coaxed them out into the lake.

The proverbial picnic shower came, and the people hastened for shelter to the steamer. Those in the sailboat were drenched and, in trying to turn their boat around, they lost control of it.

Nehemiah seemed to be everywhere amongst his people, seeing that all had as good a time as possible.

Looking out over the lake, he noticed the sailboat.

"What's the matter there?" he shouted. "They seem to have lost control of their boat."

"She's driving before the wind all right," said the captain of the steamer, "and she's making hard for the falls."

Nehemiah jumped over the steamer's railing to the wharf and, without asking leave, cut loose another sailboat that was dancing by the boat-lender's wharf and sprang into it.

"Look at that for sailing, mate," shouted the captain, as he and his second watched Nehemiah handle his boat. The preacher was in his element as he bounded the waves.

"Will he catch them, captain?" asked the anxious people.

"What will he do if he does?" growled the old man. But to his mate he added, "Bob, I wish I were with that boy. He's a son of the sea."

Wind and current had the sailboat in their grip and were hurrying it, apparently, with demoniacal glee and purpose to destruction. But swift as she sailed, Nehemiah's boat gained on her. Lashing his sail and rudder, he prepared the anchor, which was little larger than a heavy, dull grappling hook, and placed it for use.

"Drop your sail!" he shouted and cast his grapple. But a big wave pitched the boat away and the grapple missed.

Woods and Steele heard the words above the roar of the wind and frantically pulled down the sail. The boat's speed and erratic leaps perceptibly decreased. Nehemiah checked the speed of his boat, brought it around and came quickly back. This time the grapple caught and the runaway was brought sharply around in tow, within a hundred yards of the raging falls!

The captain could not find enough good words to express himself and poured oath-bespattered compliments on the young preacher. The good people, however, were so absorbed in the deed and in cheering that they did not hear him and were thus saved from any evil contamination.

Nehemiah's little craft towed the other boat well out of danger. Then, as the wind was still strong and he feared that he could not beat up with his tow to the wharf, he dropped back beside the other, sprang on board and took his own craft in tow.

His orders rang out sharp and clear. The big sail was again hauled up and he took the rudder. Backwards and forwards he worked into the eth of the wind. It was a sharp battle but steadily he gained, up and up, inch by inch, and foot by foot. Then a score of hands seized the boat as it touched the wharf.

"I guess the boat didn't fit, did it, boys?" said Nehemiah cheerily to his boat companions, when the boats were secured to the wharf; but, th blanched faces and chattering teeth, Woods and Steele had nothing to say. They gladly and quickly sprang ashore and lost themselves in the crowd; while the girls were hurried away by the womenfolk.

Nehemiah had come to his own. His bad horsemanship was almost forgotten and entirely pardoned. He was now his people's hero.

"He's a man, if he can't ride a horse," said the superintendent, and all the young men on Woodhill Mission are ready to thrash the man who does not agree to that statement.

"The Public Be Pleased"

WHEN the McAdoo tunnels were first opened under the Hudson they were not patronized by the public nearly as well as Mr. McAdoo thought they would be. After much speculation as to the cause of this Mr. McAdoo decided that the tunnels would be well patronized if the public could be induced to have confidence in the railroad and its officials. So he gave it out that the motto to be followed by all of the employees of his company should be "The public be pleased." It seems to have done its work, for the McAdoo tunnels to-day are very well patronized.

There is a growing tendency on the part of business men to cater to the wants and desires of customers. Advertisers were formerly content to ignore the complaints of unsatisfied customers, but all reputable concerns nowadays go to the utmost extent in satisfying patrons. Many instances illustrating this have come to the notice of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD since it first began to publish its guarantee.

Whenever any of our subscribers is defrauded by an advertiser in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD we will make good the claim, provided that the subscriber, who must be of record, has mentioned THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in writing to the advertiser, and provided the claim is made to us within two months of the date of the appearance of the advertisement.

Duty Done Under Difficulties *

IT is instructive to look into the faces of those who have achieved success. In nearly every case, you will see on them the marks of sorrow and of care. There has probably never been any great career without its periods of wearing anxiety and heart-breaking grief. These leave traces on heart and brain, but the tribulation worketh patience, and patience, experience, and so on, until without shame we can stand at our goal, facing the great prizegiver. He will read our hearts as well as the written record, and will know whether we have rightly fought the good fight and really earned the crown of life.

So that all we have to do is to fight. We need not worry for fear the reward will not come. It is unworthy to work solely for a reward. In the great millennial day "No one will work for money and no one will work for fame." But when the discouragements come, as they came to Moses, to Nehemiah, to Paul, the sore heart may properly comfort itself by remembering that God knows the hard effort and the eager desire. He will not blame as man would.

Duty is easy when it lies along the path which is trodden by the majority. It is when principle and conviction force you to walk a lonely way, ridiculed or persecuted for your singular beliefs, that it becomes hard. The old hymn says:

> Broad is the road that leads to death,
> And thousands walk together there;
> But wisdom shows a narrow path,
> With here and there a traveler.

Christ came to overturn long established customs and to reform society. Society does not wish to be reformed and it is jealous of its customs. It therefore repudiated and crucified him.

If we try to follow Christ, we, too, will not remain quiet when we see that society is adopting wrong practices. It is our duty to protest against them, even unto death.

It is true that there is a form of angry or hysterical protest which harms more than it helps any cause which we would promote. Judgment and discretion should be used, but let us keep burning ever in our hearts the sacred fire of enmity to evil; and, to use another figure, stand ready to give it a bayonet thrust at every chance.

But how shall we know duty? There are temptations on all sides, and sometimes these are arrayed in the guise of an angel of light. They say, "This is duty," "That is duty," simply to lure the soul to destruction.

A great writer says that when he was very young, perhaps four or five years old, he passed a pond on the bank of which a little spotted turtle was sunning itself. He lifted a stick which he was carrying, and thought that he would destroy the little creature.

"But all at once," he says, "something checked my little arm, and a voice within me said, clear and loud, 'It is wrong.' I held my uplifted stick with wonder at the new emotion, the consciousness of an involuntary inward check upon my actions.

"I hastened home and asked my mother what it was that had told me I was doing wrong. She wiped a tear from her eye, and said, 'Some men call it conscience, but I prefer to call it the voice of God in the soul. If you obey it, it will guide you aright; but if you turn a deaf ear to it, it will fade out little by little and leave you in the dark. Your life depends on your heeding this little voice.'"

It is conscience which, when the mind is perplexed, can generally direct us. It is truly God's voice.

COLUMBIA

GRAFONOLA $100 to $250

The COLUMBIA GRAFONOLA is "the one incomparable musical instrument," the one perfect, unique and most versatile entertainer.

The perfect union of utility and entertainment afforded by the Columbia Grafonola "Regent," illustrated below, is neither approached in any other instrument nor has it even been attempted.

The "Regent" Grafonola is a complete library or living-room table for every-day use in exactly the same degree as it is a complete musical instrument of unexampled versatility and matchless tonal qualities—the complete instrument ready at any and all times equally for library-table service or musical entertainment.

We have just completed the new Grafonola catalogue, showing and describing the following types of the Columbia Grafonola:

THE "REGENT"
Library table type, as illustrated in the scene below (Mahogany with curved legs, or golden, fumed or Mission quartered oak with straight legs), $200. Circassian Walnut, $250.

THE "DE LUXE," $200.
(With Regina Attachment $225.)

THE "MIGNON," $150.

THE "ELITE," $100.

Never mind if you haven't made up your mind. That is what the catalogue is for. Send for the catalogue and decide afterward.

At the same time we will send you a complete catalogue of the new Columbia Operatic records just now ready to come off the press. The artists whose services are enlisted, with the exception of Lina Cavalieri of the Metropolitan and Manhattan Opera, are mostly those who have been most conspicuously successful during the 1910 season of Opera at the Boston Opera House. In these new Columbia Grand Opera records an improved process of recording, improved materials, and extraordinary care in every department of manufacture have worked results that will be instantly apparent to every connoisseur of the highest art in musical reproduction. The orchestral effects and accompaniments are especially fine, and many of them have never been equaled in the art of recording music.

GRAPHOPHONE $20 to $100

If you are prejudiced against all "phonographs," please admit that you have not heard a 1910 Columbia Graphophone. Lay your prejudice aside long enough to go to the nearest Columbia dealer and hear David Bispham sing "Kathleen Mavourneen"; or hear the great evangelist, Gipsy Smith, sing "He Lifted Me"; or glance through the Columbia Record catalogue and have the salesman play for you whatever happens to be your favorite band selection, or hear Kubelik on the violin, or Vess Ossman on the banjo, or the famous sextette from "Lucia," and the almost equally famous quartette from "Rigoletto" sung by the greatest artists of the Boston Opera.

Any Columbia dealer can fit you out with a complete Columbia Graphophone outfit, ranging in price from $20 up to $100.

If you have intended to own one some time, you have waited long enough: the instrument is now a perfected product. That is, the Columbia. So, when it comes to choosing, make comparisons. Whatever price you have in mind, it is too much money to invest in the dark.

If you want to think it over before you hunt up the dealer, write to us for complete Graphophone catalogues and they will be forwarded promptly, together with the name of the nearest Columbia dealer.

Questions and Answers

In forwarding MSS. to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, enclose stamped envelopes for return, if unavailable.

J. M. R., Lyndon, Ky. Please correct this sentence: "Anything worth doing at all is worth doing well."

The sentence, if fully expressed, would read: "Anything that (or which) is worth doing at all is worth doing well." The idiom "at all" is not incorrect. It is one of those strong, characteristic phrases which give flavor and force to a language.

E. H. L., Watertown, Ill. Have we Biblical authority for believing that the faith of one for another is honored? For example: If I pray for the conversion of some one, have I a right to believe that person was saved in answer to my prayers, though he may not have given any evidence that he was converted before his death?

We have a right and a duty to pray for the conversion of others, and we have the many promises of answer to believing prayer. No prayer of faith is offered in vain. To claim, however, that any one person is converted in answer to our individual petition is to claim too much. In most cases, we cannot know the antecedent circumstances. Many others may have been praying for the same person.

F. B. D., Philadelphia, Pa. Please explain, through THE MAIL-BAG, what ether is.

Ether is made from several sources. There is phosphorie ether. Nitric ether was discovered in 1681 by Kunkel. Muriatic ether is made from chloride of tin. There is also acetie ether and hydriatie ether. Dr. Charles T. Jackson, of Boston, Mass., discovered that by inhaling ether the patient is rendered unconscious of pain. The term ether is also applied to a transparent and sparse fluid supposed to fill celestial space.

E. A. S., Provincetown, Mass. 1. Has the prophecy contained in II. Tim. 4: 3, been fulfilled? 2. To what "faith" did Jesus refer in Luke 18: 8?

1. In a certain sense, the verse would seem to describe modern conditions, i. e., the preaching of various "strange doctrines," the running after worldly sensation and after teachers who appeal to sense rather than to spiritual truth, who disregard the divine will and teach what the enlightened soul knows to be false; who are either afraid or unwilling to preach a whole Gospel. 2. The passage, more clearly stated, would read: "Shall he find on the earth any faith or belief in or expectation of his coming?" i. e., will he find any faith in a coming Avenger and any belief that the Church's Lord will ever return to be with her on the earth?

H. E. F., Durand, Wis. Please explain Gen. 4: 15, last clause. What was the mark the Lord set upon Cain?

Many conjectures have been made as to the character of the mark. Some have held it to be a miraculous change in Cain's external appearance; others, a mark or sign on his forehead; still others a leprous spot or a general paralysis, or a wild ferocity of aspect that made him abhorred. But the correct reading of the passage does not bear out this interpretation. The original words are: "The Lord gave a sign (or pledge, or token) to Cain that no one who found him should kill him." This "sign" may have been of the nature of an interdict to Adam and his family, forbidding them to kill Cain.

Reader, Des Moines, Ia. How are we to understand Heb. 4: 10?

It is a beautiful passage. The apostle had in view the three great Sabbaths: 1, the Creator's Sabbath when he rested from his work; 2, the Sabbath of the Son when his earthly sojourn was ended and his work of redemption completed; and 3, the Sabbath of the Holy Spirit, when Christ has delivered up the kingdom to the Father, when all rule and power are made subject to him, and when death is destroyed. The passage refers to the second of these Sabbaths. This is the interpretation taken by Rev. Dr. Campbell Morgan and other eminent Bible scholars.

J. F., Steubenville, O. 1. When and by whom was the prefix "Saint" applied to Matthew, Mark, Paul and others? 2. Are the creeds in the different evangelical churches written in the same words? 3. What is the meaning of the sentence, "Communion of saints," in the Methodist Episcopal Church creed, and "holy Catholic Church?"

1. "Saint" was originally a title of reverence, accorded to holy men and especially to martyrs, and was given by the early Christian Church to distinguish them from the sacred men among the Jews and pagans. There was no formal canonization until the Catholic Church introduced it in the tenth century by Pope John XV. 2. No; there have been modifications in the creeds of different denominations. 3. The Protestant definition is that all saints "who are united to Jesus Christ their head, by his Spirit and by faith, have fellowship with him in his grace, suffering, death, resurrection and glory," and have also communion with each other in all duties, public and private, that conduce to spiritual progress and material good. "Catholic" in the creed signifies "universal."

A Canadian reader, Mr. Thomas Kent, of London, Ont., sends us this note of cheer:

"Having been a favored reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the past thirty years, it is a pleasure to bear testimony to its usefulness to Christianity and the general uplifting of the human race, its ennoblement and advancement in civilization during the past three decades, and the very generous proofs on record of the many and very costly instances of aid in alleviating so many calls from all parts of the world. Where distressed humanity, regardless of creed, color or nationality, has been so largely your debtor, the nations may well rise up and call you blessed."

This unsolicited testimony is due in the main to the great army of CHRISTIAN HERALD readers who under the leadership of Dr. Klopsch have been actively engaged in many good works all these years. The paper itself is simply the channel through which their kindly deeds flow.

M. R., Greensboro, Ga. My pastor took for his subject lately, "Unanswered Prayers," and the sermon did not strengthen my faith, but troubled me. Now I believe with my whole heart that if we abide in Him and his words abide in us we shall ask what we will and it shall be done.

There is no doctrine more clearly taught in the Scriptures than that God hears and answers prayer. If we abide in him and have faith in his promises, we can pray with assurance. It is his prerogative as Creator and Preserver to care for all who call upon him, and to deny him the power and the will to do what he promises (through revelation by the prophets and holy men, and through his own Son) is to deny his dominion. Prayer, rightly used, is the greatest weapon in the Christian's armory. The prayer of faith reaches the throne and is never unanswered; it may not, however, be answered in the way we wish, nor at the time we want, but always in the best and the wisest way. There have been so many well-attested answers to prayer, both in Bible and modern times, that the conclusion is undisputable. Yet, to those who are not living spiritual lives, and are not in harmony with the divine law, this is not easy of belief. There is a wide bridge between the life of the world and that of faith, and it is only the child of God, who practises faith daily, and who reaches out in perfect confidence, asking the divine guidance and support in all things, who can rightly understand the true power and value of prayer.

B. F. B., Allentown, Pa. 1. Is reading a sermon, preaching? 2. Is there a difference between preaching and reading? 3. Did apostles and reformers read their sermons? 4. Why is it that educated ministers usually read their sermons?

1. Yes. 2. Not as the words are commonly used, when applied to sermons. 3. Probably not. 4. Because the custom of extempore preaching fell into disrepute two or three centuries ago. It was found to be discursive and weak as then generally employed. In the reaction, men, in order to prove that they had studied their subjects, began to write their sermons. It was considered that they could scarcely follow a deep train of thought or present a logical discourse without writing it out. Jonathan Edwards wrote his sermons. So also did Phillips Brooks. Most ministers now, while preparing their sermons carefully beforehand, deliver them without MSS.

T. J. K., Chicago, Ill. The ——— Church in ——— Street, wants to build a $15,000 church. The old building is rather dingy and out of date, but is capable of seating the congregation, except on special occasions. They are not able to build so expensive a structure without overpressure. To raise money or subscriptions, various plans or schemes are used. One plan is to get people to promise so many bricks. A class of twenty girls is asked to give or promise 10,000 bricks—a total of $100, or $5 for each girl. They are not all able to give this, but they feel that they must or else be out of place in the class or in the church. Some of these young ladies are alone in the world and just starting to earn their own living. Some have homes, but very little money. Are the pastor and teachers who urge this business doing the Lord's work as he would have them do it, or are they harassing the flock?

It should be the pleasure as well as the duty of all who have the means, to unite in any effort to provide a fitting church home for the congregation with which they worship. To do this may sometimes necessitate self-denial, but we do not believe that it would ever be gretted. We have known many congregations take up the burden of erecting the Lord's ho under most adverse conditions and amid gr discouragements, but they found joy and ble ing in it. Yet wisdom and judgment sho attend such work. It is worse than foolish a congregation, for the sake of appearances, attempt the erection of a building beyond th means and then be compelled to dedicate to t Lord a structure that is mortgaged up to t roof-peak. Nor is it wise or just to impose heavy a share of the burden upon the we ones, the poorer members, or the young. T best rule is that each should give voluntar and as generously as his means and opp tunities permit. There can be no objection contribution pledges for all who are reasona able to redeem them.

D. C. R., Chanute, Kan. What do you c sider "the books of a lifetime," and w are they "the greatest"?

This expression is used merely to indicate books which have worth not alone for passing moment, but for a whole lifetime. Th form what we call the body of "classic lite ture." This is usually referred to as "the gr literature."

Mrs. S. C. B., Chatham, N. Y. 1. Why sho I be a Christian? 2. How shall I kn that I am a Christian?

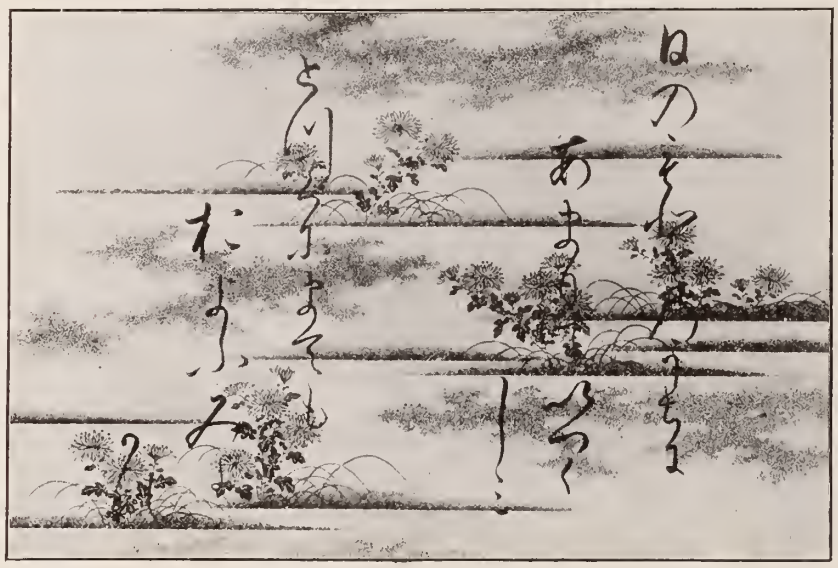
1. You should be a Christian because Chr tianity stands for the highest and noblest spir ual development of the race; and becau Christ, uniting God and man as Saviour a Mediator, presents the most perfect model e known for life and conduct. 2. Because y will long to be like Christ and will study a obey his words; and you will hate sin a strive constantly to avoid it.

F. B., Perry, Mich. The Layman's Missiona Convention hopes to evangelize the wo in this generation. What length of time they mean by "this generation"?

A generation is usually accounted to me thirty-three years. The narrowest interpre tion of their words would be: "Within the li time of the founders of the movement." T broadest would be: "Within the lifetime of a of those now living."

J. E. W., Stanfield, Ore. What is the mea ing of Luke 17: 37?

The passage has been interpreted as referri to the Roman eagles—the standard of army—and as signifying the approaching struction of Jerusalem. The broader interp tation, however, is that wherever moral a spiritual corruption are found, there the m isters of divine judgment will suddenly come



A Poem Written on Silk Paper by the Empress of Japan

BOTH the Emperor and Empress of Japan are accomplished writers of patriotie verse. On a recent occasion the Empress sent for Marquis Matsukata, President of the Red Cross Society of Japan, and personally handed him a poem which she had composed in honor of the Society and of the humanity and patriotism it represents. The poem, which is written on decorated silk paper in the Japanese character and reproduced in the photograph above, is translated as follows:

"Of the Empire overflowing the boundaries,
Universal Love even unto strange lands
Marches onward: how glorious the age!"

A LAND OF SHRINES AND SUPERSTITION

By NEVIN O. WINTER

Author of "Brazil and Her People of To-day"

'T is surprising in traveling over Brazil, Peru and Chile to see the number of shrines and chapels that dot the wayside and crown the lls. Some miraculous story is told in connection th each, and there is in each a relic of some kind at is greatly venerated. Many of these images e horrible to contemplate, especially some of those presenting the agony of Jesus. At one shrine in razil is an image of Judas and a great knife with hich the pilgrims give him a dig as they pass by. nages and paintings of the Virgin have been ound" by the hundreds, generally in thickets, and is was always a sign that the Virgin wanted a mple built to her on that spot. Nothing but the eepest credulity and most abject faith in ne priests could induce a belief in such a iracle or alleged divine manifestation.

One can admire the courage and heroism f the early Catholic missionaries. Some ollowed side by side with those adventurers nd explorers who pushed their way hrough trackless forests and almost impassable swamps in their search for arth's treasures. Others plunged into egions hitherto unpenetrated by white nen, or went out alone among the cannibal ribes and lived with them. In order to ppeal to the childlike nature of these borigines every device and paraphernalia f pomp and procession was adopted in heir services. Miraculous finds and appearances became common, so that sacred ites for the building of religious edifices vere frequently located by these means. The trouble has been, throughout all of South America, that these crude rites, which were intended to captivate the Indians, have crept into the services where an Indian is never seen. In the cathedrals of Rio de Janeiro and Buenos Ayres, where few Indians attend, one will find the same appeals to the eye and ear as were devised for an unlettered and savage people. Catholic Christianity has become paganized instead of paganism becoming Christianized. Religious worship has sunk to such a low level that the educated and thinking part of the population have become absolutely indifferent to all religious doctrine. I talked with many representative citizens of different republics, and their answers were all like that of one prominent Chilean, whose father was an Englishman: "I do not pay any attention to religion; my wife looks after that feature, and she is a very devout churchwoman."

The ignorance of the masses is appalling. This is properly charged to the priesthood, for, until within recent years, the educational system was entirely under the control of the Church, and is even to-day in a few of those republics. In Brazil only has union of Church and State been constitutionally abolished. The priests in general seemed to want to keep the people in ignorance, for in that way a more abject obedience was secured, as intelligence always brings about inquiry and investigation. The agent of the American Bible Society in Brazil said to me: "It is painfully depressing to one engaged in offering the Scriptures to the people to hear three-fourths of them say, 'I don't know how to read.' Another obstacle is the religious superstition of the people concerning the Bible we offer them, and the belief so strongly inculcated by the priests that they have no right to read it. Very often a bishop would send out a letter to the priests and people warning them against the 'false Bibles.'" They, however, make no effort to give the people the translation which they believe to be the true one. In Peru, it is still possible to find places where, if a letter is placed in a box with the proper fee, an answer will be received from the Virgin or Christ himself. Letters from saints are very common, and indulgences are still openly sold. There is less fanaticism on the east than on the west coast. The Brazilian prides himself on his forbearance and generosity. So far as I could observe there is absolute freedom of worship throughout that republic, at least in the cities. In the remote districts of the interior missionary efforts might meet with a fanatical outburst. The official attitude, at least, is one of toleration and religious freedom. Argentina, too, partakes of the same spirit, and the large foreign element helps to preserve a freedom of worship. Many thousand Englishmen live in that country and their influence is very marked. I met an American missionary stationed at Quito, Ecuador, who was mobbed less than a year ago. He, together with his wife and daughter, were awakened in the middle of the night and compelled to leave the city at once.

Little Kindergartners of Sao Paulo, Brazil

Should these people be looked after? I sincerely believe so. It is not proselyting, for the men profess no religion. Nowhere in the world can greater religious indifference be found, and nowhere in the world is a religious awakening in greater need. There are a number of workers, but the proportion is small. A few score of missionaries among forty millions of people is not a great number. Some of the colleges under the auspices of the Protestant churches are doing a great work. Among these might be named Mackenzie College in Sao Paulo, Brazil, and the boy's school in Santiago, Chile, which are Presbyterian institutions; Granbery College of Juiz de Fora and the Petropolis (Brazil) School for Girls of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South; Santiago College, a school for girls in Santiago, which has a wide reputation in Chile, and a number of other institutions in Argentina and Uruguay, of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Educational work and medical assistance provide the best means of reaching the ignorant and superstitious millions of that great continent to the south of us, and it is to be hoped that increasing numbers of workers will be sent by the various religious societies.

SEEKING THE LOST

An Unpublished Discourse by DWIGHT L. MOODY, America's Greatest Evangelis*

This is the sixth of twenty remarkable sermons by Moody, never before published, and the existence of which was disclosed only a few months ago. The absolute authenticity of the sermons is vouched for by the evangelist's son, Wm. R. Moody, who cordially approves their publication in this paper. The sermons are the exclusive property of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. One will appear each month.

I HAVE always been very fond of this text, because, just in a few words, we are told by Christ himself what his mission was in this world. He tells us that he came "to seek and save that which was lost." And in another place he said that he did not come to condemn the world, but that the world through him might be saved. In still another place he said he did not come to destroy life, but that his mission was to give light and life to this world.

Dwight L. Moody

Mark you, he says that he came to "seek." You hear a good many people speaking of "seeking the Lord"; but no man ever thought of "seeking the Lord," until the Lord first thought of "seeking" him. During these thousands of years, God has been seeking the lost. Take the parable in the fifteenth of Luke. There's that man who had a hundred sheep. One is missing. Does he go to bed rejoicing, and leaving that one out on the mountains? No. He leaves the ninety-nine and goes out into the desert to hunt the lost one until he finds it, and he doesn't maul it and kick it and hurt it. He puts it on his shoulder and brings it back. It is not the sheep that rejoices, but the shepherd who rejoices.

The Missing Piece of Silver

Then he gives another parable. A certain woman had ten pieces of silver. One piece is missing. Some one had paid her a bill that day, and she takes out the money and counts it, and there are only nine pieces. One is missing. What does she do? Sit down in the chair and let that piece find its way down into her pocket? No. She finds a hole in her pocket. The piece is somewhere in the house. She gets a broom and sweeps diligently, turning the furniture upside down and creating a great commotion; and at last she finds that piece of silver. It is not the piece of silver that finds her, but the woman that finds her silver; and she calls her friends, and says, "Rejoice with me, for I have found that piece of silver."

What is that parable for? It is to teach us that He is the seeker. It sparkles like a diamond upon the bosom of Scripture. We find him speaking and using the title, "The Son of Man," no less than thirty-eight times. Some one has counted up the titles as 156, and the last was "the Son of Man." None of the apostles ever called him "the Son of Man." Stephen said, "I see the Son of Man standing at the right hand of God." Jesus seemed to delight in that title. He was glad to get down among the people—to get into sympathy and touch with poor, fallen humanity. "The Son of Man is come to seek and save that which was lost."

The Son of Man Seeks You

Now, there's not a man or woman in this house whom he has not sought many a time. There's a class of people who labor under a delusion, who think that when the Lord seeks them out, they will be saved. They are waiting for the Lord to do something more for their salvation than he has done thus far. But our salvation is complete, all wrought out. He can do no more. Don't let any one go away with the delusion that the Lord never sought for him. Did you ever read a tract entitled "Eternity"? Do you not remember how, in your early childhood, God was seeking through your godly, sainted mother, or your father, or Sabbath School teacher, or minister who pleaded over you? Have you never been in a church where the sermon moved you mightily? There was a man in Brooklyn some years ago who was awakened, and he told how, night after night as he went home after a debauch, his mother's picture, which was hanging on the wall, seemed as if with its eyes it would pierce his inmost soul, and he turned the picture toward the wall, feeling in his heart that the Son of Man was seeking him through that picture of his mother. Did you never get a letter from your father or mother, or some friend, urging you to become a Christian? Don't let any one say, "The Son of Man never sought me." He sought you from your infancy up, and he is still seeking. Who put it into your heart to come here? Who put it into the heart of God's people to have the churches all opened? Was it the work of Satan, or of the Son of God? These men who have been toiling and preaching and working here are the instruments of the Spirit of God who is working, and Christ who is calling the wanderers back to the fold. The very air is charged with the Spirit of God. The Son of Man is seeking you to-day—this very minute!

Bartimeus Hears of Jesus

I think we only get a partial view of what happened when Christ was here on earth. We find him coming near to Jericho. About a week before he got to Jericho, there was a man coming down from Jerusalem, and he finds a poor fellow sitting by the wayside crying "Bakshish! Bakshish!" He asks, "What is your name?" "My name is Bartimeus." "I see you are blind. I have no silver or gold, but I have some good news for you." It's a hard thing to make a beggar believe this, especially in that Eastern country. Bakshish is the beggars' god. That is the thing they are after. And this man pricks up his ears, and he says, "Something better than bakshish?" "Yes, there's a God in Israel who can give you sight." "I never saw the mother that gave me birth," the poor fellow answers. "I never expect to see her in this life." "I am come from Jerusalem," says the other, "and I saw a man there who was born blind and who has now got his sight." "How did he get his sight?" "Did you ever hear of a man named Jesus?" "No; who is he?" "He is a prophet of Galilee. He has been living up here at Capernaum; he goes down to Jerusalem quite often. He was there on the feast. He met a man who was blind and asked him if he would like to get his sight. He said, 'Yes.' And Jesus spat upon the ground and made clay, and anointed the man's eyes, and while he was washing, he got his sight." "What did he charge him?" "Nothing." "What!" cries the beggar, "gave him his sight for nothing?" "Yes; for nothing. And I was talking with one of his disciples, Simon Peter, and he said that Jesus of Nazareth would pass through Jericho next week. Now, don't you let him pass through without bringing your case before him." "Well, now," cried the beggar, "do you think I would miss such a chance? I suppose I'll need some of the chief men of Jericho to call upon him and intercede for me." "No," says the other, "the poor have as much influence with him as the rich. In fact, I think they have more, because he's a poor man himself. As I heard him preach, he said, 'The foxes have holes and the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of Man has not where to lay his head.' And they tell me he isn't worth anything; he is a poor man himself. I tell you, if you'll go right to him with your trouble, I believe he will give you your sight." "I will," says the beggar.

The Blind Beggar's Appeal

We can imagine the little children or the dog that had been trained to lead the blind beggar through the streets of Jericho, while his cry rang out, "Bakshish! Bakshish!" morning after morning, while he was listening to hear any sound of the Prophet's coming. Perhaps he made inquiry, and kept saying, "Anybody heard of Jesus of Nazareth? Have you heard of his coming? If you do, will you let me know? I want to see him." Did you ever hear of a blind man wanting to see a person? I was in a deaf and dumb institution in Illinois, and there were two blind men who wanted to "see through the institution." I laughed at the idea, but the superintendent of the institution said it was a common occurrence. Well, we took them all through the institution and they seemed to see. They had a pretty good idea of that institution for the deaf and dumb. And so this blind man wanted to see Jesus. I imagine them leading him, and at last he hears the footsteps of a coming crowd. He's got ears if he hasn't got eyes. And perhaps he mistrusts who is coming. He says, "Who's coming?" And they tell him that Jesus of Nazareth is passing by. That name thrills him. "Jesus of Nazareth! That's the man to give me sight." And he began to pray, right there in the highway. Some people say they can't pray, but if you could give them hope of getting their sight they would soon begin to pray. "Thou Son of David, have mercy upon me!" cried the blind beggar. They tried to silence him, and said, "Sh! keep still there. Don't disturb this man now. He's got important business—going to his coronation to Jerusalem. Don't want to be disturbed by a poor, blind beggar."

Some one has said, "They would stop every hp in heaven to hear a sinner." Would to God he wo d hear a sinner in this church this hour. O man f you can get eternal sight for the asking, you d better ask now. If a man can get a sight that n sweep beyond this scene into the supremest worl — if he can get eternal sight by asking, he had be r ask. They could not silence Bartimeus, and e more they tried the louder he cried, "Have me y upon me." The Master heard that cry. He alw s does. My friends, if a cry goes up from t s gathering, I believe it will be heard in the gates f heaven, and the answer will come back before I t through preaching. He is so anxious to save t t he will come and save you now. Remember e prayer of Bartimeus: "Thou Son of David, h e mercy upon me." Don't you want him to h e mercy upon you? Supposing you say it: "Th Son of David, have mercy upon me." I want h to have mercy upon me. I don't know that I v l ever get beyond that prayer in this world. I do t want justice, but mercy. What does the Script e say? He "delighteth in mercy." He "delighte in it. Let him show mercy to you now. If heard that poor beggar at Jericho, won't he h you? If he answered him, won't he answer yo your cry, that is an honest cry? He is unchan able grace. He is in glory, but he delights to g gifts to the sons of men. O man! O woma Don't go out of here without getting eternal sig Did the Master hush up that man? No. He sa "Go fetch him."

Seeing the Master Face to Face

I see one of the disciples going and saying, "B timeus, the Master sends for you; he is going bless you." They took him by the hand. His g ment fell off, and he let it go. Dead in earne When a man is in earnest, he gets a blessing. Je asked, "What do you want? Call upon me, an will show you great and mighty things." Tha what is said in the Scripture. "Lord, that I m receive my sight!" He received it right then a there. That mortal could say what no other mor could say on this earth, that the first object th met his gaze was the Son of God himself. What day that must have been for Bartimeus! Was that worth more than silver and gold? If the Lo had given him all Jericho, wouldn't it still ha been worth more than that? I have the idea th he sang as sweetly as the singers up in that choi "Hosannah! Hosannah to the Son of David He changed his old cry—no longer praying, b praising.

Do you know why there are so few people sav here to-day? Do you want me to tell you? Becau there are so few who believe they are lost. That the trouble. There's the trouble. A woman can to a meeting some time ago. There was a crow accumulated before the door was open. She g separated from her little girl and she could not fi her. She sent up word to the minister to call o her child. The minister said, "Mary Moore has g lost, and if she is in the house she will please ris Mary Moore is lost; if she will rise, the mother w be glad to find her." No one rose. They took t word to the mother that the child was not in t house. The mother got the bell-ringer to go up ar down the street, crying: "Lost! Lost!" And t hour passed. And the woman got almost franti They found Mary Moore was on the front seat i the meeting. "Why," they said, "why didn't yo step out when we called your name?" "Oh, but wasn't lost." She felt it meant some other Mar Do you see the point? When you preach to then they say, "No, I'm not lost." That's the troubl

A Prison Visitation

During the war, when Grant was lying in fron of Richmond, I was going up to Chicago, and passed through New York. I spent the Sabbath i New York City, and I went to the Fulton Stree Prayer-meeting. During the meeting I spoke an at the close of the service a man came to me an said, "Will you go to the Tombs to-morrow an preach?" "Yes, sir," I replied. I supposed th prisoners would be brought into the chapel; but, t my horror, I found I had got to speak to them i their cells. I had never tried that. It was stee work to preach to people you couldn't see. Ther were two rows of cells above me and one below, an I stood and talked to 350 or 400 convicts. After wards I thought I would like to look at my audience and I went to the door of the first cell and there wa a little window just to let light and air in. And

RAINDROPS AND THE RAINBOW

By Rev. J. M. Farrar, D.D.*

VACATION and some good friend may take you for a visit to Niagara Falls. There is a beautiful story I want you to read while you are at the Falls. I think the story came from the Sunday School Times, but am not certain about it. But here it is, a beautiful story about a few raindrops:

YEARS and years ago, up in Minnesota, a thousand miles away, I came down from heaven, a handful of raindrops, just as pure and beautiful and tiny as the new baby in its mother's arms. As I trickled down through the fields, where the birds sing and the grass is green, I just sang to myself for very joy, for it seemed to me that that was all I was made for, just to laugh in the sunshine and play along between the tiny banks of the little stream they call the St. Louis River. But pretty soon my waters began to get muddy.

OH, I wasn't beautiful at all then. I was ugly, just as ugly as boys and girls when they have got away from the sweet innocence of their baby days, and their hearts have been all roiled up with bad words and bad thoughts and bad stories. And I wondered how I was ever going to be clean again, and then one day, all of a sudden, I took an awful plunge and went down and down, and when I asked the water around me, for there was lots of it, oh, millions and millions of gallons—four hundred and twelve miles of water from east to west—I asked it where I was, and it said, "You're in Lake Superior," and as I went down lower and lower, one thousand feet down to the bottom of the lake, it got cold, almost freezing, thirty-nine degrees above zero, and I said to myself, "Well, I shall never see the sun again or be warm again, or be happy again." One day I found myself going up and up until I did see the sun and was just as warm and happy, and do you know I was not dirty any more, my waters were just as pure and clear as crystal. Then I said, "Oh, I'm glad that I lost my life in the life of this great lake, and that I went down so low, giving up everything so, for now I'm pure," and I thought of Jesus' words: "Whosoever shall lose his life for my sake and the Gospel's shall be as white as snow." And I was contented to stay there—it was a happy life and a useful one—for great ships, carrying eight thousand tons of cargo, steamed back and forth over me, making men richer and homes happier and children brighter.

BUT God wouldn't let me stay there in Lake Superior, though I was happy and doing lots of good, so I had to move on, just the way people do; you have to keep changing and growing old. And so one day I had to leave Lake Superior and go down through the St. Mary's River and the great locks at a place they call the "Soo." I thought I might stay there, because I was very useful. They carried twenty-six million tons of valuable cargoes through me every year, more than all that passes through the Suez Canal. But no, I had to leave the St. Mary's River and Lake Huron and Lake Erie, and, oh, it was a long, long journey, and my life dragged out sometimes, for it is very tiresome to be always moving! And sometimes my waters that were so pure in Lake Superior got dirty again and finally when I came to Buffalo I was awful ugly—oh, dirtier than ever I had been back in the little St. Louis River! There was every kind of dirt on me—oil, and coal dust, and sewage from the city. Oh, it's very hard to keep clean when you go through cities, for they roil you up, and put bad things into your heart! When I came by Grand Island I was so soiled I thought I'd never be really clean.

AND then one day I began to be whirled along at an awful pace—faster than a horse trots. Then I knew something awful was going to happen! It was death, the water said—a great plunge off into space—a drop of one hundred and sixty feet, clear out of sight. I did not want to take that awful leap over the Falls, for the trees whispered to us that the river fell on to great granite boulders with jagged edges that broke the stream into millions of millions of tiny drops. Oh, it was death, awful death, and no wonder I fought against it! If you will go up above the Falls you can see the river fighting hard against the current. That's why the waters are all stirred up so, for nobody likes to die, not even a river.

BUT suddenly I took the plunge. It was awful! Instead of a river I was then a great cloud of spray, and instead of being ugly and dirty, or pale and colorless, I was all colors of the rainbow—the most beautiful sight in all the world. Such glory that the people that stood on the long bridge shouted for very wonder at the sight. I was beautiful pure white spray, and there was the rainbow of God arching over me. And then I was glad that as a river I had died, and it seemed to me as I looked in the face of the great sun that I heard him say, "I am the Sun of Righteousness—I am the resurrection and the life—he that believeth in me, though he die, yet he shall live."

TWO things I ask my Juniors to do with this story. First, trace on the map the rivulet and the river until you know the history of Niagara Falls from the Raindrops to the Rainbow. The knowledge gained will be a valuable part of your education and may be of value to you in some school examination. Second, think of it as telling the story of your life from birth to death. From it you can learn the meaning of life and the beauty of death.

The Talking Engines

By Rev. William Carter, D.D.,

THIS is a story, boys and girls, of long ago when engines talked and gave a lesson to all who would rise superior over difficulties and be successful in life.

At the foot of a very steep hill, up and down which were laid the shining rails of a railroad track, a "round-house" had been built where extra engines were kept to help the heavy freight trains over the steep grade. One day an extra heavy train got stuck on the hill and a large mogul engine, with seven-foot wheels and massive machinery, was brought out to push the stalled train over the grade.

The mogul didn't like the work very well, for though he was big, he was also lazy, like some big and even little boys that I know. When, therefore, he saw that long train of heavy cars and the big hill before him he began to sigh and wheeze and groan through his steam "exhaust' as though he were really and truly exhausted, though he wasn't, you know, even a littl~ bit.

Well, notwithstanding all this, the trainmen coupled him on to the train, the engineer "opened the throttle a notch," as they call it, and as the steam was turned into the piston box the big engine panted and grunted with each blast of steam, and as his wheels began slowly to revolve he kept saying protestingly and discouragingly: "I can't do it! I can't do it! I can't do it!" and then as the engineer gave him more steam he panted out: "I can't, I can't, I can't do it! I can't, I can't, I can't do it! I can't, I can't, I can't do it!" But still the engineer kept the steam on, feeling sure the engine could do it if he tried, and at last, do you know, that great, big, overgrown engine just "lay down," as you boys sometimes say, and, as the wheels began to revolve slowly and still more slowly, wheezed out finally: "I ca-a-a-n't, I ca-a-a-an't, I ca-a-a-an't do-o-o-o-it!" So with a last snort, which the engineer echoed with a snort of disgust, that big, lazy old engine stopped dead still.

Well, of course, they had to uncouple him and he was hastened back to the round-house out of the way and a little "dinky"—sometimes people called it even a "donkey"—engine was brought out to take his place. As the little engine, all energy and determination, was hurried past the big mogul, the mogul looked with disdain upon him and using every ounce of steam left in his exhaust said: "Oh psha-a-aw!"

The little fellow didn't mind it, however, as you little boys and girls mustn't mind when the big ones say unkind things about your size and ability, but he just "buckled down" to his work as he was attached to the waiting train, and as the engineer turned the steam into his piston boxes he just said manfully and determinedly as he took a long breath for his big work: "I think I can! I think I can! I think I can! I think I can!" And then as he found notwithstanding his smallness and the size of the train that his energy and determination were really moving the load up the steep hill, he changed his cry with a chug, chug, chug, as the wheels began to move more rapidly, and he shouted: "I ca-a-an! I ca-a-an! I ca-a-an! I can! I can! I can! I can! I can! Can! Can! Can!! Can!!! I can! Cu! Cu! Cu! Cu! Cu! Cu-u-u-u-u-u!!!" And then when he got to the top of the hill he cried exultingly as he went whirling down on the other side: "I knew I could! I knew I could! I knew I could! I knew I could, could, could, could! I knew I could, a could, a could, a could!!!"

And so the famous victory was won at last, as you boys and girls may always win it, notwithstanding your size, if you only have courage and hope and determination.

CHILD LABOR IN SOUTHERN MILLS

By ROSA PENDLETON CHILES

CHILD labor will continue to be one of the most interesting of subjects, until the problem it offers is solved wholly in behalf of the children and the sound of the spindles no longer mingles with the tramp of little feet. It is usually the dark side that is presented; but the writer is glad to be able to point out something hopeful. Harm has been done to this great cause by enthusiasts who have overreached the mark in some misguided statement—such a statement, for instance, as that in South Carolina children work twelve hours a day in the mills, whereas in that State it is a prison offense for either employers or parents to permit children to work twelve hours a day. The campaign against child labor is more dependent upon a sane movement than on sensationalism.

A little more than a year ago South Carolina established a Department of Industries, combining it with the Department of Agriculture and Commerce under one Commissioner. Such a department, regulating the labor of the State and enforcing the laws concerning it, is the most effective move that could have been made in its influence upon child labor; in fact, nothing productive of more general good has been done since milling has been a Southern industry. Colonel E. J. Watson, Commissioner of Agriculture and Commerce since the establishment of that Department in 1904, is one of the most active, tactful, and efficient men in public place whom the writer has ever known. The system adopted by Colonel Watson is based upon the successful German method, but is an improvement upon it. It enables the Commissioner to have complete knowledge at all times of each child in every mill in the State and renders evasion of the law almost impossible.

Col. E. J. Watson

Colonel Watson's object from the start has been to reduce as far as possible the employment of women and children in the mills. Strange as it may seem, in this he has had the endorsement and assistance of the majority of the mill managers themselves. There is in South Carolina a law that the child of a widowed mother, a totally disabled father, or one who is an orphan, may work in the mills. There is also provision enabling children under age to work in the summer; but Colonel Watson has steadily opposed any exemption whatever from the twelve-year-old limit, and many employers, agreeing with him, have issued orders to their subordinates not to employ children under twelve years. By these means, and by enforcement of the general law against employing children under twelve, the number of children in the mills has greatly decreased. Colonel Watson's mid-year address, delivered before the Manufacturers' Association of South Carolina last month, gives some interesting figures. He said:

Belton Mill Library

> I know it will be gratifying to you who are the employers, as it is to me, that comparison shows 1,314 children under 16 years of age, less in the textiles of the State at this time than eleven months ago, and that to-day there are only 361 children 12 years of age employed under exemption affidavits, which is 418 children of this age less than there were in the mills eleven months ago, and 565 less between the ages of 14 and 16. At the same time, the total number of employees of all classes in the textiles of this State has increased from 47,616 in July 1909, to 47,978 at this date in 1910, or an increase of 362 in the total working population; but what is more important, the increase has been by 1,666 in grown people.

In this address, Colonel Watson advocated a law forbidding the employment of children under twelve years of age on any account, a law making education compulsory, and such amendments as will greatly strengthen the law in regard to sanitation, ventilation and the safeguarding of dangerous machinery. He called upon the Manufacturers' Association to place itself on record as endorsing such measures. Prompt and unanimous endorsement was given, and a legislative committee to assist the Commissioner in securing the enactment of these measures when the General Assembly meets next winter was appointed.

Compulsory education is an important consideration for the children of the mill villages. If kept out of factories, they must not be left to idleness and mischief. Colonel Watson's desire is for a fourteen-year-old limit, and this will probably come in a few years, but the time for it is not ripe yet. It is hoped soon to see a sixteen-year-old limit, which will give every child a fair chance in the public schools.

The mill schools are now doing excellent work, and many of the mills themselves have erected handsome school buildings. In 68 villages reporting educational advantages this year the child population is 14,838 under 14 years. Of these, 5,101 attend school and 750 attend kindergarten classes. Those under 6 are 7,240, leaving only 1,747 under 14 in the 68 villages for work in the mills. The kindergarten work among these little folks is especially interesting. They have two hours a day at play, and seem to be merry and happy in spite of the fact that they work for a living.

Many people have the impression that the majority of operatives in the Southern mills are children. Of the 47,978 operatives in the mills of South Carolina, 7,712, or about 16 per cent., are children under 16, and of those 3,879, or about 8 per cent. of the whole number of operatives, are under 14, and 361, or less than 1 per cent., are under 12.

Some of the Southern mills are putting in machinery for the production of finer fabrics, and the handling of this will require older and more skilled operatives. Doubtless there will be some pathetic cases of appeal to the mill managers to give children work, because of poverty and dire want; but these must be met by intelligent charity, for the burden of supporting either himself or his family is too heavy for a child's shoulders, and his labor service to his community and State is too important to permit him to grow up in utter ignorance.

PROGRESS ON THE PANAMA CANAL

A View of the Sill of the Auxiliary Dam

View of West Wall of the Canal, Looking North

As month after month passes and the great interocean ditch, known as the Panama Canal, is scooped out and the gigantic concrete walls rise on either hand, the voices of the faultfinding wiseacres who predicted failure have grown fainter, and few there are who do not believe firmly in the statement of Colonel Goethals that the heaviest ships afloat will be passing through from the Pacific to the Atlantic in five summers from now. Some engineers believe that this statement is too conservative and that the canal will be opened at least a year earlier. At any rate, the progress made during the last year has far exceeded that of any other twelve months, and the most sanguine of the brilliant young engineers on the construction corps have at times been astonished at the rate they have been able to carry the work forward.

In 1908 the amount of earth taken out of the ditch was 36,230,904 cubic yards, and at a less cost per cubic yard than any previous year. So much work has now been done that even the ordinary observer, with no knowledge of engineering, can get a fair idea of what the artificial river, with its massive banks, locks and dams of concrete, will look like when completed.

At present there are at work one hundred and one steam shovels, forty-eight of ninety tons, forty-two of seventy tons, ten of forty-five tons and one of seventy-eight. Every time one of these dips its iron beak into the real estate of the isthmus it brings up, to all appearances, an amount equal to one-quarter of a New York city lot, and after a short time in one position the shovels are pushed on a little further. As the tourist watches these great mechanical diggers at work, he involuntarily wonders how long it would have taken to do the same work by bone and muscle, the way it would have been done if King Louis of France had followed the advice of Samuel de Champlain and tried to dig a canal across the isthmus about the year 1610; for the engineers of to-day are only doing what the founder of Quebec would have liked to see as a reality three hundred years ago. Yet, with all our modern appliances and knowledge, it is a task which seemed impossible up to a few years ago, and the success of which will command the admiration of the world.

The recent great advance in concrete construction is one of the principal reasons why a successful canal has become a certainty in such a brief period of time. The retaining walls and the dams and locks are of concrete, and concrete plants have been built at various convenient points along the canal.

The forms used in the construction of the dams and locks on the Pacific division of the canal are the invention of Alexander P. Crary, an expert in concrete construction. The wooden forms may be seen at the top of the walls in the photographs. Although they are of wood, they can be used over and over again, carrying up the wall in six-foot layers. The solid panels at the top hold the fresh concrete, while the uprights are anchored to the harder layer below until the concrete on the upper course is hard enough to stand by itself, when the forms are raised by a stone derrick and a hand-winch. Every successive stage in the hardening of this concrete work is carefully observed. At the Gatun locks six resistance thermometers are embedded in the walls to determine the degree of heat at various stages of the hardening process. The concrete when it is put in place is of the consistency of thin plaster. After it is in position large rock is added in places, making what is called cyclopean concrete. It will take several years for all of the concrete to harden completely.

It comes as a surprise to most of us to find that they are using concrete to build boats for use in the construction work. Three of these boats have already been built under the supervision of Engineer Crary and another will be finished by October. The concrete barges are practically indestructible, but it seems as if natural law had been subverted when these stone and cement barges are launched and go gliding easily out upon the water, ready to carry a load of many tons. Vessels of concrete have been built in Italy, but few have, until recently, been constructed here. On account of the scarcity of good timber and the high price of skilled labor, these concrete boats are cheaper than those made of wood. These barges are sixty-four feet long and twenty-four wide. Iron bars and wire cloth are used to reinforce the concrete. They will be towed from place to place by tugs. We often refer to our day as the age of iron and steel, but as one watches the work on the isthmus we have to add that it is the age of concrete.

PEOPLE IN THE PUBLIC EYE

MR. HENRY W. DEXTER, who died in New York City on the 11th of July, was one of the most remarkable old gentlemen in our country. He was ninety-eight years old and he went to his desk every day until within a year or two and took the most active interest in the affairs of the world. His activity after he was ninety years of age was probably greater than that of any other man in our country. He was one of the founders of the Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York City, and was also one of the founders of the American News Company, which has grown into one of the greatest organizations of its kind in the world. He built a home for the New York Historical Society, and he founded the Lucretia Marquand Memorial Home at Sioux Falls in South Dakota. This is a hospital for Indians, in whom Mr. Dexter has always been greatly interested. Mr. Dexter also provided a fund for the purpose of defraying the expenses of sick Indians to and from the hospital when they were too poor to pay their own traveling expenses. Mr. Dexter was often asked to what he attributed his long and healthful life, and he declared that it was due to simple living and constant industry combined with an active interest in people and things. Nearly all of Mr. Dexter's estate of more than $1,000,000 was left to religious and charitable organizations, $250,000 being left to the Salvation Army.

THE beloved and venerable Rev. Dr. H. Grattan Guinness passed away recently at Bath, England, aged seventy-five. This remarkable man trained more men and women to become missionaries than any other of the devoted leaders of modern days. He made scores of ministers and evangelists for the home field also. Dr. Guinness will be chiefly remembered as the founder of the "Religions Beyond" Mission. But he was a great preacher and evangelist himself, as well as a splendid Christian organizer. He was the son of Captain John Guinness, and was born in Dublin in 1835. He was collaterally related to the famous Irish orator and patriot, Henry Grattan. Romantic circumstances were associated with Dr. Guinness's parentage. His mother's first husband was Mr. D'Esterre, who was shot by Daniel O'Connell in a duel; and it was to remind himself of this deed that O'Connell ever afterwards wore a black band round his wrist.

Henry W. Dexter

Rev. H. Grattan Guinness, D.D.

Dr. Guinness appeared as a young preacher in the year 1850, simultaneously with Rev. C. H. Spurgeon. Crowds flocked to hear both these eloquent young evangelists, and it was expected that they would become equally famous. But while Spurgeon took a Baptist pastorate, Guinness preferred to remain a free lance, and he took largely to writing on theological topics. His works are greatly prized, especially his splendid volume on The Approaching End of the Age.

Dr. Guinness' experiences early convinced him of the need of a more highly trained body of workers for service amongst non-church-goers. He organized in 1875 Harley College, the East London training institution, in which Christian men and women of any denomination are trained both for home evangelization and also for missionary work abroad. Dr. Guinness was a keen and tender-hearted philanthropist. He was one of the first to call attention to the horrors of the Congo rubber atrocities and most eloquently and pathetically pleaded for the reform of the Belgian administration.

The Shooting of Mayor Gaynor

MAYOR WILLIAM J. GAYNOR, the reform executive of New York City and one of the best chief magistrates the metropolis has ever had, was shot down by the hand of an assassin on August 9, as he was about to sail for Europe. He was on the cabin deck of the ocean liner Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, at Hoboken, surrounded by friends to whom he was bidding goodby, when the would-be murderer—a tall, rugged, hatless man—crept up behind him and discharged his revolver, the bullet entering his victim's head behind the left ear and shattering the jaw-bone. Three other shots were fired, but missed their mark, before the man was overpowered and borne to the deck. The Mayor, who had fallen, was tenderly lifted and taken in an unconscious condition to a stateroom, and thence he was conveyed to St. Mary's Hospital, where his wound was examined. At this writing, he is hovering between life and death. The surgeons hold out a faint hope of his recovery. His assailant, who seemed to be insane, gave his name to the police as James J. Gallagher, but would make no explanation of his criminal deed. He is said to have been an employee of the Dock Department, and was discharged for drunkenness a little over a month ago. In a sense, therefore, Mayor Gaynor may be said to be a victim of the political system he sought so earnestly and so sincerely to reform. His strong sense of justice, his determined opposition to political corruption in every form, his struggle for better municipal conditions and a higher standard of morals and efficiency in the public service have won him the respect and admiration of all right-thinking citizens, and the bitter enmity of the time-serving, graft-seeking class who regard all office as opportunity for plunder. Mayor Gaynor's high executive ability, his simple, sturdy honesty, his rugged truthfulness, his open, fearless war on municipal evils and evildoers, and his love of fairness to all classes of citizens alike have made him known far beyond the limits of New York. Both as judge and mayor, he has presented the best type of American citizenship and the most desirable model of public servant. Should the attack on his life terminate fatally he will be universally and sincerely mourned as a martyr to duty.

The War on the Bible

THERE is a rising storm of protest over the action of the Illinois Supreme Court in excluding the Bible from the public schools. In other States, the people are awaking to the far-reaching importance of the issues that would be involved were the Illinois precedent to be followed elsewhere. In the Western State, there was a significant co-operation of the Jewish, Catholic and agnostic influence against the Bible. It has been the glory of this nation, since the foundation of the Republic, that we had an open Bible. Now that the first serious blow against the freedom of God's Word has been struck, who can tell how far the assault may be carried? Nation after nation, which had lain under the blighting restraint imposed upon its religious freedom, has shaken off the shackles. Shall we suffer the Bible to be shut out of our schools in obedience to the same power that has made it a sealed book to nearly all the South American republics? There is no room in our public schools for dogmatic or sectarian teaching, and there should be none. But the Bible belongs to no one church, or sect, or denomination. It is the divine message that has come down to us through the ages; the moral and spiritual manual of all humanity; the best guide to right conduct and pure living; the foundation of all law, and the source from which society has drawn everything we deem admirable and worthy in our civilization. It is indispensable to the education of the young and the formation of human character. This is the book which the plotters against the Christian religion would exclude, if they could, from every school in America. It is not a local or even a State question, but a national one. We see the same battle waging in other countries. In Saxony, it has been going on nearly six years. There, however, the defenders of the Bible have fought a good fight, and thus far the modern science reformers—who would eliminate Bible study from the schools or have the sacred book interpreted after the manner of some of our own "advanced" theologians—have been compelled to make compromises. Saxon Protestants, and especially Lutherans, while willing to shut out sectarian teaching, are resolved that religious instruction shall continue, with the Bible as the inspiring source, and that "the person of Jesus should stand at the centre of instruction." They insist that the great central figure of all history should not be eliminated, but that the teaching must be such as will make "the mind of Jesus live in the child," who must be taught to recognize Him as the great example for the human race. If the battle for Bible exclusion is to spread here, as we believe it may, there will soon come a testing-time for all true Americans who have at heart the perpetuation of those principles which are essential to national life and greatness. "Blessed is the nation whose God is the Lord."

Mr. Roosevelt and the Miners

WHILE President Taft was busy at Beverly with the preparation of his next message to Congress, the keynote of which is to be general economy in every branch of the administration, Theodore Roosevelt took two days off from editorial duties to pay a flying visit to the Lackawanna Valley. He saw for himself how this lowly stratum of the great commonwealth lived, how its people labored and what stern economies they were compelled to practise to keep body and soul together. Alternately tramping and riding through the valley from Scranton to Dickson City, he visited the mines, inspected the breakers, saw with a sort of grim compassion the great tragedy of child labor in the smudgy, unwholesome atmosphere, and was incidentally begrimed with coal dust. Then he visited the silk mills, noted the pale little, stunted "bobbin-girls" and "winders," and learned from their own lips of the long working hours that robbed them prematurely of youth and deprived them of the joys of childhood and opportunities of education. In the Wyoming Valley he saw miners' families with twelve to seventeen children. For the first time in his life, probably, the foremost American of his day came in contact with the poor, pitiful, narrow lives of these people, conversed freely with them, and even visited them in their humble homes. What a contrast between such lives and those with whom he had been familiar! In that single day, he had an insight into social and labor conditions such as no amount of reading or outside study could give. It is well for our public men to go down to the bottom of such problems and learn the truth for themselves. There was probably no politics in Mr. Roosevelt's visit, but he will be all the better equipped for the discussion of industrial problems, either with voice or pen, since his experience among the homes of grinding poverty and ceaseless toil.

The Glory and the Shame of It

THERE is something sardonic in the jubilation with which the defenders of the liquor traffic point to the latest official figures from Washington showing the enormous annual revenue from license fees. In a single year, the sum of $41,950,181 was paid in the large cities alone. They "point with pride" to the fact that the drinkers of the country are thus shown to be among the largest contributors toward paying the expenses of running the government of these great cities and indirectly of keeping up the national finances. All this vast sum of money comes straight from the pockets of the habitués of 67,131 saloons and other drinking places. Texas, Wisconsin and New York lead this bibulous procession in the number of saloons in proportion to population. To make the showing complete, we should place side by side with these figures, the number of hearts broken, homes disrupted, lives ruined, crimes inspired and committed and arrests made; the number of trials and convictions and the cost of supporting all the paraphernalia of justice in the form of police, magistrates, criminal courts and prisons. We venture to affirm that the shame, the disgrace, the infamy of it would outweigh the revenues a hundred-fold.

RULING OUT THE BIBLE

Hope to See It Restored

We read with regret of the withdrawal of the Bible f our public schools in Illinois, but we are glad for the st taken by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in this matter, and hope see the Bible restored to its rightful place.

A Novel in Place of the Bible

This ruling out of the Bible from our public schools is bu retrogressive step toward the dark ages. It is the wedgepo of Catholic tyranny, menacing our liberty and eclipsing source of light. The Bible in our public schools is not cause of "sectarian teaching" and should not be ruled out get rid of a bad effect. When the cause is ruled out the eff will cease; but the Bible should remain. This blighting act the part of the authorities is a sad mistake. No Bible in school means that the school has no respect for God. writer visited one of our public schools where was substitu for the Bible a novel! May not this be repeated elsewhe Darkness lurks where the Bible is absent; and worse wher is ignored and banished. Let us pray and labor for its reste tion. OSCAR J. RAISOR

Catholic Influence

Please let me ask if you do not think it is the presence of many Catholics in the public schools that is the primary ca of the move? Non-believers, I think, will be found indiffer in the matter, but it is a very sore point with the Catholics.

Ashamed of Her Native State

I feel it is my duty as a Christian to congratulate you what you have written in regard to "Ruling Out the Bible" the public schools of this State. I cannot see why intellig or Christian people could have made such a great mistake. will mean an awful blow to the rising generation. I thi Illinois has wickedness enough to account for without addi more, by teaching its children to discard the Bible. I a ashamed of such an act. Let us pray to have the bles Bible back in the schools. MRS. N. E. JOHNSON.

Americans Stand by the Bible

Contrast North America with those nations to whose peo the Bible is a scaled book. If our public schools in th teachings are an offense to any, it is easy to take their childr into their own schools, where they will be kept in profou ignorance of God's truths, and where they will be brought up the darkness of idolatry. But as for all true American citize give us the open teaching of God's truth.

Manœuvres of National Camp

SINCE the passage of the law last spring, the National Army and the State Guards have been brought into a closer affiliation. By that law e State troops became an arm of the Federal ser-ce and are subject to the call of the National Gov-nment even to service outside of their State lines. ie National troops and State Guards have gone to camp at Pine Plains, Jefferson County, New ork, where there will be the experience and disci-ine of the camp-drills, manœuvres, sham battles, c. In these sham battles, there will be the tramp horses, the wheel of gun carriages, the riding of valrymen with their sabres, the marching of sol-ers, firing of guns, etc. In our country we have the gislative department of government which makes e laws, the judicial department which interprets em, and the executive department which enforces em. Policemen, constables, sheriffs, army and vy are required to properly enforce the laws. is has been necessary in all nations in all times. ie children of Israel had only been out of the land Egypt a little over a year before Moses, at the mmand of the Almighty, organized a national my in the wilderness of Sinai:

edication at Provincetown

Friday, August 5, the monu-ent commemorating the land-g of the Pilgrim Fathers at rovincetown, Mass., was dedi-ted. Great men of the State d different States were pres-t, and President Taft made e main dedicatory address. iree years ago the corner-one was laid by President oosevelt. For many years e Monument Association has d the matter in hand, and th $25,000 from the State of assachusetts, $40,000 from e National Government, and th contributions from private izens, $90,000 have been ex-nded on this splendid me-orial. Founded on mother ck, the shaft has been con-ructed to endure through the nturies. Sixty-six hundred bic yards of sand were ex-vated to provide the founda-n, the weight of which is 3,200,000 pounds. From e foundation to a point 164 feet above the base, ur square sides carry a width of 27 feet. Above at level a buttressed head with outswelled apex tends fifty feet further into the air, furnishing open-air battlement observation platform, from ich springs a narrower battlement with an added ight of about thirty-eight feet. Flights of stairs d to the top of the monument, where the climber ll find himself 201 feet above the hilltop, and 296 et above the harbor waters. An impressive fea-re of the dedication was the unveiling of a tablet ich took the place of the one which was destroyed fire in the old Town Hall in 1877, and which bore s inscription: "In commemoration of the arrival the Mayflower in Cape Cod Harbor, and of the st landing of the Pilgrims in America at this ace, November the 11th, 1620. This tablet is pre-nted by the Cape Cod Association, November the n, 1853." Dr. Elliott wrote the new inscription. e monument will also mark the first declaration of il rights ever issued in this country, as made by e Pilgrim Fathers as they landed on these shores. is a beautiful and healthful thing for a nation to ild monuments in honor of noble and heroic events. othing could be more appropriate than the erection this splendid monument at Provincetown. The triarchs of old set up material memorials of im-rtant events.

nd Jacob set up a pillar in the place where he talked with him, n a pillar of stone. (Gen. 35:14.)

uelty to a Child

The papers make reference to the case of Martin nnors, eight years old, who has been for three years at the Orange Almshouse, at East Orange, N. J. It is stated that there was not another child inmate to keep him company and that his companions in the poorhouse were feeble-minded people ranging all the way from fifty to a hundred years old; that he was tied by a string to a stake in the yard near the house in the daytime and confined indoors at night. The boy's mother was discharged from the same poorhouse three years ago, and being unable to support her son he was left in the care of the institution. The attention of the State has been called to the deplorable condition of this boy, and Governor Fort has promised that immediate relief shall be given, and proper permanent provision made for him. That a child in the boundaries of East Orange, one of the most beautiful, wealthy and cultivated sections in the United States, in a State as prosperous as that of New Jersey, should grow up under public care from five to eight years of age without one child companion, one hour of play, one moment of liberty or one minute of education, is scarcely conceivable, and we still hesitate to believe all the details of cruelty that the secular press has recorded; and yet we fear that the actual facts reveal a cruelty befitting an African jungle, or the savage shore of some South Pacific Island. The boy can only speak a few words and acts like a baby two or three years old, and although he is somewhat feeble-minded, there is no doubt that much of his deplorable mental condition is occasioned by his lack of companionship, play, education, and love. We must not forget that we are living in a Christian dispensation with a Christ civilization, which considers that feeble-mindedness, or weakness of any kind, is a reason rather for cure and education than for neglect and brutality. The mistreatment of a child is rebuked by the prophets of old and by the Master, who took the little ones up in his arms and blessed them.

He shall gather the lambs with his arm, and carry them in his bosom. (Isa. 40:11.)

Where Coin Is Unknown

Coin has been known and used in almost all nations in all times. Gold, silver, copper, brass, glass, sea shells and other substances have been the circulating medium, but in the Cocos Islands they have no coin. The parchment notes of George Ross are the sole medium of exchange. The other day Mr. George Culnies Ross, the king of the Cocos and Keeling Islands, died. The islands, which lie in the Indian Ocean, 700 miles west of Sumatra and 525 from Christmas Island, were discovered in 1609 by Captain William Keeling. They were uninhabited till 1825, when they were colonized by John Culnies Ross, the late king's grandfather. During his reign Darwin visited the islands, in 1836. He was succeeded by his son, Mr. John Culnies Ross, and in his time the islands were proclaimed British territory, their chief being appointed governor. He married a native wife and the late king was the eldest of six sons. Mr. Ross was the most benevolent of despots, with the power of life and death over six hundred subjects. Poverty is unknown in the realm; the head of every family has a house, a boat, a garden and a poultry run. No young man can marry until he has built for himself and his wife a dwelling. There are no rates, taxes or police, yet order is preserved. The inhabitants, in turn, keep watch at night against fire and over the safety of their boats. These coral islands in the South Indian Ocean are beautiful beyond all description. Mr. Ross's eldest son succeeds his father as chief of the islands. The succession of rulership from father to son which has been maintained in these islands is according to the custom of most of the monarchies, ancient and modern.

And all the people of Judah took Azariah, which was sixteen years old, and made him king instead of his father Amaziah. (II. Kings 14:21.)

Pockets Picked in Church

American tourists in Rome have had their pockets picked by the wholesale. One of the most popular fields of theft is the house of God. The Rev. Dr. J. G. Van Slyke, pastor emeritus of the First Reformed Church of Kingston, N. Y., while at prayer in an important church in Rome, had his pockets picked. His purse contained some two hundred and fifty dollars in money and some railroad tickets. He reported the matter the following morning at the American Consulate, where no surprise was expressed. "You're No. 28," he was told. "What do you mean?" asked Dr. Van Slyke. "Twenty-seven others robbed in that same church yesterday have already reported before you," was the reply. This is the limit of insolence and sacrilege and criminal device. The Saviour made a terrific arraignment of those who came into the house of prayer to steal from their fellow men.

It is written, My house shall be called the house of prayer; but ye have made it a den of thieves. (Matt. 21:13.)

The "Mona Liza"

Art-lovers all over Europe and America are just now greatly interested over the reported theft of the "Mona Liza," the famous painting of Leonardo da Vinci, which has hung in the Louvre. It is said that through the connivance of a high official the canvas has recently been removed from its frame, and a copy substituted. The original is thought to be in the hands of an American collector. Probably no painting has created more interest than the "Mona Liza," as it is acknowledged to be the great Florentine's masterpiece, and is ranked second only to the "Sistine Madonna" of Raphael. It has been said, though not authoritatively, that the British government once offered one million pounds for its possession, but the offer was refused. The subject, "Mona Liza," or "La Gioconda," as she is sometimes called, was the wife of Gioconda, a Florentine citizen. It was between 1500 and 1506 that she posed for Da Vinci. The execution of this painting took five years, as it was only while seated in a certain posture, and listening to a certain strain of music, that her face took on that peculiarly elusive expression so wonderfully portrayed on the canvas. Da Vinci dared not have her sit for him very often, for he feared that too frequent repetition might lessen the strange effect of her surroundings. Some one has said that this picture is divine work rather than the work of man. And it is true that in facial expression and in the delicacy of skin texture Da Vinci has here wrought to a degree almost perfect. How inappropriate to associate so beautiful a picture with such a miserable crime as the theft of this masterpiece! And yet what does avarice care for anything most beautiful and divine? The theft of this picture is only another one of the myriad forms of wrong-doing that covetousness suggests. The prayer of the individual and of the generation as well might properly be that of the Psalmist:

Incline my heart unto thy testimonies, and not to covetousness. (Ps. 119:36.)

CHATS ON MY COOL VERANDA

Hammock Days

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE guest room of a friend opens upon a side porch which is in reality part of the room. As it is the frequent custom of people who love the fresh air to sleep out of doors at this time, the porch is thoroughly screened and furnished with a hammock suspended from the ceiling by strong chains. The hammock is completed with a mattress and pillows, and is in effect a luxurious swinging bed. Here one who prefers the full purity and sweetness of the outdoor air to the best ventilated room that can be found, may have such slumber as belongs to those who have healthful fatigue at night or the happy spirits of childhood. We remember with a certain curiosity and astonishment that there was a yesterday in which intelligent folk were afraid of night air, and therefore excluded it from sleeping-rooms by every device within their power. Modern hygiene has no terror of night air, except in swampy regions, and there modern good sense undertakes without delay to carry on a system of perfect drainage. If swamps and marshes breeding miasma must still exist it behooves those who wish to be well to keep away from such perilous proximity both day and night. The only air we can breathe at night is night air, and the freer its course through our sleeping-rooms, the more alert and vigorous we are when we have to attack the day's work.

The porch where the hammock swings is much more than a sleeping adjunct to an ideally exquisite guest-room. A cushioned couch in addition to the hammock stands against the wall. There is a large writing table and there are two or three wicker chairs with footstools within reach. The fortunate guest at whose disposal all this convenience and luxury are placed may here entertain her friends and callers, write her letters, read her books and otherwise enjoy her solitude when she does not wish to join the family of her hostess.

In the hammocks of which I am now thinking tired girls and women, doing nothing except lie still and muse in the sunshine, forget their weariness, cease to be run down, and return from the languor and relaxation of their holiday able to begin the autumn campaign. So many of our girls and such a throng of our women are toilers and wage-earners that they need a vacation partly spent in the hammock, fully as much as one spent in tramping, playing tennis and sailing on the bright waves. Exercise is good in its time and place, but for weary people relaxation is better. Part of the outfit for rest and recreation at home should be a hammock. Have it where you like—in your own chamber if you prefer, on the veranda, or in the garden, but do without something else and own a hammock as your personal property.

A Beautiful Golden Wedding

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Gilbert Osborne, of 148 Marion Street, Brooklyn, have been subscribers to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for many years. In all the great CHRISTIAN HERALD family there are none more loyally attached to it than they.

On the evening of May 6, this year, they celebrated their golden wedding at the home of their daughter, Mrs. Charles J. Williams, 1591 Pacific Street, Brooklyn. The house was decorated in yellow and white with a profusion of daffodils and tree roses.

Four generations were present, the great-grandchild being a boy of eight, while the bride and groom of the occasion have not yet reached three score and ten. A unique and charming feature was the presence of the minister, Rev. Mr. Whittaker, who married the pair fifty years ago. The pastor of the Greene Avenue Presbyterian Church, of which Mr. and Mrs. Osborne are active members, was also a guest. Many friends congratulated the honored couple and they received many gifts.

Just fifty years ago their grandparents celebrated their golden wedding at Southold, Long Island, where the Osbornes were themselves married, and in 1870 they kept their diamond jubilee.

In the World's Largest "Tent City" at Rockaway, Long Island, New York

ROCKAWAY, on the south shore of Long Island, New York, has the largest tent city in the world. The tents are set over wooden platforms, and some have small yards in front and rear gay with bright-colored flowers. Most, however, are satisfied with the sand. The ground is leased and people make their homes there for the entire summer, the men folks going daily to their work in New York City. The regular streets and walks give it an air of permanency which we seldom associate with a canvas town. It is expected that next year an amusement park will take its place.

THE ARMY OF TO-MORROW

MORNING after morning the tread of many feet,
Like an army marching wakes the quiet street,
With their sunny faces lighting up the way,
The merry-hearted little folk begin their busy day.
Though little do they dream it, they live their blithest time,
And who shall sing their gladness in the measure of a rhyme—
With naught of care to cloud them, with easy tasks to do,
And teachers full of gentleness to guide the learners through
The mazes of the labyrinth, till all the grades are past,
And the coveted diploma is in the hand at last?

Perhaps an honest lad who walks so sturdily along,
May one day win the suffrages of many a mighty throng.
The boy whose foot is planted now on learning's lowest round
May scale the heights of science or its deepest ocean sound.
The soldiers of the future, its splendid rank and file,
Are hurrying forward here to-day where little children smile;
Here, too, beneath the daintiness of dimpled flowerlike face,
We catch the flitting sweetness of the mother's look of grace,
Where yet Love's steady light shall burn above a cradle bed,
And the tenderest love is watching o'er a little golden head.

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

Origin of Surnames

NO little interest attaches to surnames, studying as most of them do in remote periods. The family of names ending in "son" or "s" point to a common ancestor in each case. Johnson, Anderson, Williamson, Peterson, Remsen, Simpson, Simonson, Nelson, Jackson and others similar in derivation carry thought back to a patriarch who started the clan. In the Bible we find Simon, son of Jonas or John, spoken of, and sometimes the prefix Bar, meaning son of, is used to indicate relationship.

The Johnsons and Jacksons must have had a fraternal kinship in the beginning, and so must the Neilsons and the Nelsons, the Simpsons and the Simonsons, and so on. Many surnames indicate their origin as due to some craft or art. Webster, Weaver, Dempster, Carter, Wheeler, Baker, Carpenter and others bear witness to the early occupation of the family in its beginning. The various colors are represented as Black, White, Gray, Green, Blue, Pink and Brown, all of which designations are familiar among our acquaintance and on signboards. There are Grinfields, Redfields and Whitefields, Blackledges, Stoneledges and Cartledges to be found in our cities, while there are Macs and O's springing from Irish or Scotch lineage. We are by the way of thinking that few names are so common as, shall we say, Brown, Jones and Smith. In a brilliant essay by Gilbert K. Chesterton there occurs this passage in reference to the surname Smith. It is so delightfully suggestive that I am tempted to quote in full:

"The name of Smith is the name of the one trade that even kings respected. It could claim half the glory of that arma virumque which all epics acclaimed. The spirit of the smith is so close to the spirit of man that it has mixed in a million poems, and every blacksmith is a harmonious blacksmith.

"Even the village children feel that in some dim way the smith is poetic, as the grocer and the cobbler are not poetic, when they rest on the dancing sparks and deafening blows in the cavern of that creative violence. The brute reason of Nature, the passionate cunning of man, the strongest of earthly metals, the weirdest of early elements, the unconquerable iron subdued by its only conqueror, the wheel and the ploughshare, the sword and the steam-hammer, the arraying of armies and the whole legend of arms, all these things are written, briefly indeed, but quite legibly, on the visiting card of Mr. Smith. Yet our novelists call their hero "Aylmer Valence," which means nothing, when it is in their power to give him this sacred name of Smith—this name made of iron and flame. It would be very natural if a certain hauteur, a certain carriage of the head, a certain curl of the lip, distinguished every one whose name is Smith. Perhaps it does; I trust so. Whoever else are parvenus, the Smiths are not parvenus. From the darkest dawn of history this clan has gone forth to battle; its trophies are on every hand; its name is everywhere; it is older than the nations, and its sign is the Hammer of Thor."

OF THE MANOR BORN

By ELIZABETH L. GEBHARD

WILL you please use this small contribution for the children? I hear they are espe-ılly poor this year." The words were tered by a woman of middle life, in low tender tone.

"You are very kind, Miss Rutgers. e are grateful for all contributions, ıd you never forget the children. ou are right. We seem to have the ›orest of little waifs this summer, nched and pale, with scant clothing, ıt we hope to send them home with ‹o weeks' better hold on life. Plenty sunshine, nourishing food, and good mes will make different children of ‹em," returned the chairman of the ›mmittee.

"I am so sorry for them," continued e lady, her soft voice dropping away a pool of sympathy, as she turned ‹way, and the door closed on her ‹arly love-offering to the children of ıe poor.

"A box of cornstarch and a pound ' rice," said a member of the committe. "It almost makes me cry. It is veritable widow's mite, and it has ›me regularly every year since we arted this work."

"One might write a modern Bible ıll of beautiful sacrifices and gen-ous deeds, offered by the people of ır own time," replied the chairman. In this case it is both the inheritance ' lordly giving, and the piety which ten accompanied it."

Miss Rutgers was almost home be-›re her eulogy was finished, little sus-ecting the impression left behind her. he was like some delicate plant, ashed by the billows from its natural ›ming place on to some hostile shore, ıe stress of the waves of circumstance ıanging her outward appearance into orn and faded lines. Tall and slight, ith rounded curves long since lost, ıere was a stoop of physical weak-ess about her, which spoke of unequal ›ping with a hard world. The hair ıat had once been a soft blonde had ıded to a neutral tint, and, either ›llowing a fashion of long ago, or ıccumbing to the daily call for haste, ad been strained tightly into a com-act knot at the back of her head. The eatures that might once have been ›mmanding, were like all the rest of er pose and attitude, almost apolo-etic, while the good materials of a eneration earlier vainly tried to ful-l modern conditions in enveloping ıe stooping form.

A facetious boy sitting behind her in hurch one Sunday had whispered to is mother to "get on to the waterfall," hile a young girl had laughed in musement at her pastor's suggestion f companionship with the faded lady. 'et both the boy and the girl came to ee the beauty of the character that ay beneath the neutral tints.

Two generations earlier Miss Rut-ers might have lived in either of two reat manors, since she was grand-aughter of both lord and patroon. ooking beneath the surface, one knew hat under different conditions the tall tooping form would have been wil-›wy, the neutral-tinted hair and eye-rows might have carried the glints of he sunshine, and the large features een markedly aristocratic. All that vas left to-day of this heritage of the ast was a pride that still wished to e donor rather than recipient, a sweep f generous sympathy that gave out f her poverty to the children of the oor, as her ancestors had bestowed heir wealth on the necessities of the enants of wide estates, in donations of vinter coal and firewood, blankets and roths.

In frequent removals, the manor ady had strayed to the upper floor of small house, whose owner lived be-ow. As if fate, relenting, had scat-ered a spray of flowers in her path, the flight of stairs which led to her rooms was adorned with the great masters of music in life-size engravings. She mounted the first step with Handel's genial glance upon her. Neither his abundant wig, with the curls resting upon his shoulders, or his ruffled shirt, awoke a feeling of strangeness within her, his presence and welcome had become so familiar and companionable at the close of her long day. Half way up she looked into the soulful eyes of Mendelssohn. The youth of this picture, with its waves of boyish hair, gave a spring to her motions, and sometimes evoked a fleeting smile. Almost at the top of the flight her often lagging gait encountered Beethoven in high collar and floating white cravat, the strained look in his eyes and the lines between touching an emotional chord in her own heart; yet she was withheld from contagious discouragement by the humorous dimple in his chin. When at last the landing was reached, Bach's benevolent face beneath its closely curled wig gave a restfulness to her homecoming.

The landlady had at one time been housekeeper for an æsthetic music dealer. In the final distribution of his bachelor estate, the musicians had fallen to her share, and had since for many years made a musical pathway of her staircase. Perhaps in some occult way the musicians enjoyed companionship at morning and nightfall with the manor lady, as she did with them.

Across the upper hall they gazed all day long upon collections of rare old china in a glass-faced cupboard, beneath which stood a narrow-topped, broad-leaved mahogany table. In the days since Lafayette had written his letters upon this table while a guest at the manor, it had undergone modern improvement or disfigurement in the shape of robin's-egg-blue paint and gilt bands, but from the musicians to the ghosts of former manor owners and guests, there was an atmosphere that filled the little hall like the aroma from a rose jar.

Within her own doors Miss Rutgers' life still turned backward. A great flowered velvet carpet that spoke of wide spaces covered the floor, a piano of her girlhood kept company with the mahogany chairs and paintings of her father's time, while jingling candelabra from the patroon grandfather flanked the two ends of the mantel, between which hung a mirror whose shining surface was impenetrable, but which had known the blushing faces and bright eyes of maidenhood, the floating draperies of happy brides, and no doubt many a miserable face had looked within its shining depths, seeking in vain for help from sorrow and trouble.

"It was a veritable widow's mite"

One object in the room spoke distinctly of Miss Rutgers' own personality—that was her book-case, which belonged to the same date with the piano, and both to the time when she attended a young ladies' seminary, while still the family fortunes were only decadent, not decayed.

In her scant leisure, she read the French stories that were considered ladylike in her girlhood, but on every Sunday afternon her mother's Thomas à Kempis and the weekly paper formed her mental and spiritual food, the latter of the two having been offered tactfully as a gift, after the young girl had learned to know and admire the manor lady.

One by one sorrows had come, sometimes two or three at a time. Finances grew lower and lower till they almost reached the vanishing point. Alone, and poor, and proud, with only a past —and then the Fresh Air children had come, and into Miss Rutgers' barren life there dawned a new interest.

She watched for the Sundays when the notice of their arrival was given out in church, and went home with a song in her heart. Her children were coming. There must be one more sacrifice she could make, and so offer her yearly contribution. Her face lighted up at these times, till it was really beautiful with the shining of the spirit within. One could see through the wear and tear of to-day and catch a glimpse of those other days, when her grandmother, the last Lady of the Manor, whom Miss Rutgers resembled, passed out largess with liberal hand, or filled her drawing-room with the charm of her presence.

Sometimes she opened her Bible on these red-letter Sunday afternoons at the verse that claimed the poor and the needy: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my children, ye have done it unto me." With a look of devotion she could always find one more sacrifice to make after that, and it was unfailingly that of the cheerful giver.

Once she saw the children lined up outside of a soda water fountain, and her heart gave a throb of pleasure. These were the children whose happiness was hers. Sometimes she heard of little garments given, or of treats—or even the good nourishing food planned for the little waifs who seldom knew three meals in one day, struck an answering chord in the heart of the woman, who was acquainted with poverty and loved children.

It was a real trial when they came for a party to her own church. She would so have liked to have seen them all together, and enjoyed their pleasure. Since this was impossible, she listened at night with a soft glow in her eyes to the story of the landlady, as she told of snapping mottoes and paper caps, cake and ice-cream, sand-pails and shovels, and the children's songs and pleasure. Their happiness became hers. It was as if the delicate plant thrown on a barren shore had rooted in the sand, and somehow had blossomed unexpectedly.

The Fresh Air children came to be her living joy as year added itself to year. It was when the last flock came, and with them Miss Rutgers' unfailing offering, and the radiance in her face which accompanied it, that the chairman of the committee noticed that her form was a little more bent, her face a little whiter, her step a little weaker. But she went away with the old brightness, a glow of happiness which left a shining trail behind her.

It was only a few weeks later that the long mill days became impossible for the frail woman. Even the musicians on the stairs failed to cheer her tired steps at night, and half-past six in the morning came before her weary body had thought of rest. The landlady went away for a week's visit, and one morning in the gray of the early dawn, at the hour she had so often trodden the streets on the way to the long days in the factory, she awoke to violent coughing and hemorrhage. This time she dragged herself to the doctor's. It was her last walk in the chill morning twilight.

Lying quietly beneath a knitted coverlid with a red rose etched against its snowy whiteness, she spoke of the end of the journey, and of the joy that had come into her life with the Fresh Air children.

The lords of the manors were accustomed to build a manor church in which they and their tenants worshiped while alive, and beneath which at last the bones of the lords of the great estates were laid to rest. This lady, of the manor born, built no sanctuary of worship, but she held as in a chalice the noblesse oblige of her ancestors, and the human love which nothing could embitter or crush out, for the little lives waiting for the keynote of loving kindness in a hard world.

"A little neglect may breed great mischief; for want of a nail the shoe was lost; for want of a shoe the horse was lost; for want of a horse the rider was lost, slain by an enemy, all for want of care about a horse-shoe nail."

—BENJAMIN FRANKLIN.

THE author of "Poor Richard's Almanac" said lots of wise things, but no neglect breeds such great mischief as neglect of the body. Men and women are invariably prudent of everything but health. Modern conditions are strenuous and seem to demand we spend more strength than we can earn. Then comes the mischief—overwrought nerves, indigestion, sleeplessness, loss of weight and appetite, weariness and lack of ambition.

A remarkable letter from the famous author of "The Heavenly Twins,"

SARAH GRAND:

"I began to take Sanatogen after nearly four years' enforced idleness from extreme debility, and felt the benefit almost immediately. And now, after taking it steadily three times a day for twelve weeks, I find myself able to enjoy both work and play again, and also able to do as much of both as I ever did."

LADY HENRY SOMERSET

the prominent social reform advocate, says:

"Sanatogen undoubtedly restores sleep, invigorates the nerves and braces the patient to health. I have watched its effect on people whose nervous systems have been entirely undermined, and I have proved Sanatogen to be most valuable."

Very Rev. WILLIAM THEODORUS CAPERS

Dean Christ Church Cathedral, Lexington, Ky., says:

"I feel constrained to write you and say that Sanatogen has done everything for my wife. I have found this preparation restores a normal appetite and gives vitality to the nervous system."

GEORGE ADE

the humorist, says:

"I have given Sanatogen a trial and I am convinced of its merits."

Sanatogen

A Righteous Life*

IT was said of a distinguished politician that he was asked during a recent campaign what was the point upon which he laid the most stress, and that he replied: "Oh, the high moral dodge. You can't go before the American people on any other, with any hope of success."

This is undoubtedly true, and in so far is cause for profound thanksgiving. We are in many ways a wicked nation, but our God is still the Lord, and his righteousness is recognized by even the worst men among us to be "that which exalteth a nation."

It was lately asserted by an agnostic that this general insistence upon righteousness is not the result of the spread of religion among us; but simply of the progress of civilization, which is coming to be more and more understood to depend upon morality.

It is very likely true that the progress of civilization is generally seen to depend on morality—but who has taught this from the beginning? The Christian, and the lands in which the open Bible and the Christian Church are a part of the national life, are ever those furthest advanced in civilization.

Does our friend, the agnostic, see no significance in these facts?

It was always and ever urged by the Hebrew prophets and by the Christian teacher that the righteous life was the only one that the Christian could consistently live.

"The Christian religion," said Dr. Phelps of Andover, "was the first in the world to insist that morals and religion must go together."

In the Orient, and even nearer home, forms of worship usually suffice to satisfy the religious sense. Pay tribute, come at stated times to the temple, bow yourself, bathe yourself, and so on, and you purchase thereby the rewards of the gods.

But Jesus comes and says: "Forms are unimportant. Keep the Commandments. Love God and do his will and love your neighbor as yourself. Your scrupulous observance of ceremonies is nothing to God unless your life reveals obedience to him. Worship him in spirit and in truth, for the Father seeketh such to worship him."

It was an almost revolutionary doctrine, but the mind and heart of the world recognized its superiority to any religion which had preceded it. It satisfied the deepest longings of the human soul, and thus it grew, as never a faith had grown before.

Century by century, ever since the Reformation, have stricter views of living continually developed. The severity of theology constantly relaxes; but the man who would be respected by his fellow men must now regard more carefully than ever before, personal sobriety, purity and uprightness. As the politician said, in his rough way, the people demand of their servants high and ever higher moral standards.

President Nicholas Murray Butler put the matter well in a recent address to the incoming Freshman class of Columbia University. He said:

"It is the paramount duty of every Christian in this present age to see to it that he does not rest content with any low, convenient and artificial code of conduct. Let him insist upon forming his conscience by the moral ideal as revealed in Christ Jesus—the Ten Commandments, the Golden Rule and the Law of Love. Let him test himself always by that supreme and only sufficient test, the mind of Christ."

Sending Money by Mail

A SHORT time ago THE CHRISTIAN HERALD received a remittance sent through the mail by one of its subscribers. The remittance came in the form of a package which when opened was found to be a block of wood in which four silver dollars were imbedded. Judging from appearances, the subscriber had evidently spent the better part of an evening whittling what looked like a wooden boat in the hold of which the silver pieces were secured by hatches battened down with tacks. This wooden receptacle was wrapped securely and mailed, twenty cents' worth of stamps being placed upon it.

A short time ago, in another magazine office, a dollar was received for a subscription. The sender had taken a silver dollar and pasted a piece of paper on each side of it, leaving the milled edge exposed. Upon one side he placed a stamp and the name and address of the magazine, on the other his own name and address. This was dropped into the mail box and arrived safely in New York, although every mail clerk who handled it must have seen that it was a silver dollar.

Money is sent in all manners and ways through the mail. Another magazine received a lot of small coins which had been imbedded in moistened bread, which was then wrapped in a piece of paper and mailed. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has received money in all sorts of curious packages. Coins have arrived carefully glued to cards, sewed between pieces of muslin, concealed in papers, etc., etc.

Right Way to Send Money

In view of these facts it is truly wonderful that Uncle Sam is able to estimate that not more than one in one million letters sent through the mail is lost; and why people should go to so much trouble in transmitting money when the various prescribed methods are so simple is hard to understand. Surely it is better to send money and have the post office responsible for its safe delivery than to trust to one's own ingenuity to conceal the contents of the package from a post office clerk.

It may be that the practice of sending money through the mail in such odd ways is due to the fact that many persons do not understand how simple the prescribed methods are. For instance, money may be sent by postal money order for any amount up to $100 at a cost of from three to thirty cents. The Post Office is responsible for money thus sent, and such orders are payable at any post office indicated in the United States, Guam, Hawaii, Porto Rico and Samoa. Orders may also be sent which are payable in Canada, Cuba, Newfoundland, U. S. Postal Agency at Shanghai, China, and the Philippine Islands.

Advantages of the Money Order

To send money in this manner, it is merely necessary to fill out the regular blank furnished by the post offices and deposit the money. A postal money order will be issued to the sender, who may send it anywhere as indicated above, and it will be payable only to the person whose name appears upon its face, the post office being responsible for any failure in transmission.

If the person to whom the money order is sent does not present it for payment before the expiration of one year from the last day of the month in which it is issued, the order becomes invalid by law and the sender may apply to his home postmaster, who will promptly notify the department in Washington, with an application for a refund of the amount, which refund will be made free of charge. It is desirable to transmit even the smallest amounts by postal money order.

If you do not care to purchase a money order, you may send money by registered letter. This will cost ten cents, postage additional, but the government does not hold itself responsible for more than $50 sent in this way. Under the new regulation, you will receive a receipt for your letter when it is registered, but if you want a further receipt from the person to whom it was sent, then you must demand at the time the letter is registered that such a receipt be returned to you. Formerly the government returned these receipts in the form of a reddish card in every case. Nowadays, however, it is done only upon demand.

A Word as to Coins

Many persons send money by special delivery. Such letters are traceable, inasmuch as the government demands a receipt for the delivery of the letter at its destination; but this is not as safe a way as sending money by money order, particularly when coins are transmitted. A coin placed in an envelope is apt to work its way through the latter, and in any event its presence in the envelope is easily detected.

The large express companies nowadays issue express money orders which are payable in express offices belonging to the company issuing the order. These may be purchased for varying amounts not greater than $50 apiece. If it is desired to send a greater amount than $50, extra money orders may be purchased at the rate of thirty cents for each hundred dollars.

When it is necessary to transmit money in great haste, it may be telegraphed to any part of the country in which the telegraph company has a pay station. In such cases it is often possible to send money from one distant point to another within an hour's time. Very naturally the cost of this is much greater because of the time accommodation involved, the precise cost depending on the distance and the amount of money sent.

When You Send a Check

If one has a bank account, then it is possible to transmit money by check. A check made payable to a particular person can be collected only by that person, unless he or she should endorse the check over to some one else. However, if you send a large check by mail to a person or firm with whom you are unacquainted you should have it certified. A certified check is one upon which the bank has stamped its guarantee that the money is actually deposited in the institution. The bank then becomes responsible for this money, which cannot be drawn out by the maker of the check. When a certified check is received at a distance it is not necessary to inquire into the integrity of the person sending it. The bank is responsible for certified checks.

It very frequently happens that we receive endorsed checks; that is to say, checks which have been made payable to a person who then endorses his name on the back of the check and sends it in this condition through the mail. This is known as endorsing in blank, and is a very imprudent procedure, because if the cheek were to be lost in transit, any person finding it would be able to endorse a name under the name endorsed on the back and presumably draw the money. If it is necessary to send an endorsed check through the mail always endorse it over specifically to the person or firm for whom it is intended. For instance, if John Smith wishes to endorse a check over to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD he should write on the back of the check as follows:

Pay to the order of
THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.
JOHN SMITH.

In considering the transmission of money letters through the mail, too much cannot be said on the subject of legible writing. Very many letters go astray simply because of the careless handwriting of the sender. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has received a number of complaints from people who have not received replies to letters, and upon investigation it was found that it was impossible to decipher the handwriting. Such mistakes are due simply to carelessness and might be avoided if correspondents would see to it that names and addresses are plainly written.

It has been deemed advisable to state the above facts for the reason that the amount of money transmitted through the mail is becoming greater and greater every year. In spite of growing extravagance in modern living, the number of people who save money grows greater every year. Not all of these live in towns where money is bankable, and many others desiring to have their money yield them the greatest possible return are in the habit of sending weekly and monthly sums to banking institutions at distant points. There are institutions in New York which have received millions of dollars in small sums through the mail. One such institution has actually received five million dollars by mail in the past seventeen years. Remittances have been received in every describable manner, yet the percentage of loss is very small. Nevertheless it would have been smaller still if more people had resorted to the prescribed methods of transmitting money.

JESUS AS KING

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

THE whole town of Bethany is astir and it is the early morning of the day after the Jewish Sabbath. The home of Mary, Martha and Lazarus is the centre of activity. All of the people seem to be gathered there, for Jesus is mounting a young ass, and we see him make the start toward Jerusalem. His twelve apostles and others are accompanying him, going before, spreading their garments in the way as they would lay rugs over which a king might ride. And they break branches from the palm trees and wave them, crying, "Hosanna!" The procession halts as it reaches the summit of Olivet.

In Luke's Gospel we read that when Jesus viewed the city from the mountain top, he wept. How strange that one riding in triumph should weep! He wept for the city that would have none of the love which the heavenly Father had sent by him. "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem! how oft would I have gathered thee, but thou wouldst not." And then he proceeded, winding down into the valley of Jehoshaphat; crossing it, he enters the city through the Golden Gate, and then ascends Mount Moriah, on whose summit stands the temple. On the way the ever-increasing throng which accompanied Jesus is joined by another throng coming out of the city to meet him, because they wish to see the man who had raised Lazarus from the dead.

At the temple Jesus dismounts. He is greeted by the choir boys of the temple, crying, "Hosanna to the Son of David!" The glad welcome is followed by the angry murmuring of the Pharisees, who will have none of him. They complain to him about the noise of the children. Jesus replies by quoting from the prophet that praises of children are acceptable to God. Then Jesus passes across the court of the Gentiles, and discovers a temple market in progress for the sale of doves and sacrificial animals, and money-changers are there, because the people need to pay money for services connected with the temple worship. But Jesus discovers dishonest dealing and so drives out the traders and the money-changers. It was the second time he had cleansed his Father's house because they had made it "a den of thieves."

The People's View of Christ's Kingship

Zechariah (9: 9) had prophesied: "Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion! Behold, thy King cometh unto thee, meek, and riding upon an ass, even upon a colt, the foal of an ass." The Jews, therefore, expected that the Messiah would so enter Jerusalem. The ass did not represent to them low estate in the Messiah, for even to-day judges and princes ride on the fine-blooded asses of the Orient that represent peace, in contrast to the horse, which symbolizes war. Christ then rode into Jerusalem as the Prince of Peace. Jesus knew both the prophecy and the expectation, and it was, therefore, a proclamation, by deeds that speak louder than words, that he was the long-expected Messiah. But the selfish Jews had misunderstood the prophecies, and they thought that when the Messiah should come he would make Jerusalem dominate the world as Rome had done. They thought of his mission as conquest, not conversion.

The Pharisees' View of Christ's Kingship

While the people's fundamental error was in expecting for Christ only an external kingship of temporal power, the Pharisees, seemingly very different, made the kindred erro of proclaiming religion to be a matte externals, talliths, phylacteries, tc. But their contempt for the com on people made it impossible for the to believe that the Messiah could ve any other than a Pharisaic or n. The Pharisees would not have a Gli-lean to rule over them, whatever his superiority of soul. Even in Ame ca and in the Church of the Carpente of Nazareth, we need to condemn he wicked pride that puts social stan ng above character. In a certain ch ch in New B—, a pastor was very r ch criticised because he had taken th y-three Swedish servant girls into r m-bership. The pastor had in his l ne a Swedish servant who had been he means of getting her kind inter ed in the church. She had even eld prayer-meetings in the kitchen of he pastor's home for them. It was id by the critics that "such people re of no good to the church." How ut the church being good for them? an a church be good for much that i not good for the people?

Christ's View of His Kingship

Christ proclaimed not the su en and temporary kingship of force ut the slow and permanent enthrone nt of righteousness by service and lf-sacrifice, and so he came "not t be ministered unto but to minister."

At the very hour when sin en ed into the world came the first Go el, the first proclamation of the good ws that a bruised Conqueror, a Savi r-King, should come. In the pro ts, side by side with dark pictures o he sins of men and nations, there are promises of one who is to be Sove gn and Sufferer. At Christ's birth the angels proclaimed a "Saviour" w is the "Messianic Lord." On the M nt of Transfiguration, Christ, in the ry hour of his earthly coronation, "s ke of his decease which he should ac mplish at Jerusalem." And at the L d's Supper, by the giving of the brea nd the wine, he declared himself to b the Christ Lord. Let us remember th on his cross were the words: "This s the King." If we think beyond the oss, we see with John in Revelati a throne on which was the slain L nb.

Napoleon in exile, recalling the speedy collapse of his own e ire which he had so rapidly conquer by force, said: "Jesus alone founde his empire upon love, and to this day illions would die for him."

Christ had nothing with whi to conquer the world but the mig of right and the might of love. Ma ew Henry reminds us that Jesus l an his life in great poverty, in a or-rowed cradle; that he later saile n a borrowed boat, and that he rod nto Jerusalem on a borrowed ass. H was soon to hold the Passover in a or-rowed room, and later would be b ied in a borrowed tomb.

"Behold, thy King cometh unt hee meek." The story of the triu hal march of Jesus from Bethany to ru-salem was a type of his vict ous march through all centuries ar all countries. "The march of Christ wn the centuries" is a key with wh to study how Christ prevailed and i re-vailing.

On that day when Christ rod nto Jerusalem, he showed no exultati at the honors put upon him, for he new that "crown him" and "crucify im" would swiftly follow each other, ith resurrection and ascension beyon and he knew that office is not mere or chiefly honor, but responsibility and opportunity. Even heaven shou not be thought of as a place of hono and idleness, but of higher service. t is told of Thomas à Kempis that nce, during his student days, his pre tor asked the class, "What passa of Scripture has the sweetest descr tion

MOTHER'S "NOTIONS"

Good for Young People to Follow.

"My little grandson often comes up to show me how large the muscles of his arms are.

"He was a delicate child, but has developed into a strong, healthy boy, and Postum has been the principal factor.

"I was induced to give him the Postum because of my own experience with it.

"I am sixty years old, and have been a victim of nervous dyspepsia for many years. Have tried all sorts of medicines and had treatment from many physicians, but no permanent relief came. I believe nervous dyspeptics suffer more than other sick people, as they are affected mentally as well as physically.

"I used to read the Postum advertisements in our paper. At first I gave but little attention to them, thinking it was a fraud like so many I had tried, but finally something in one of the advertisements made me conclude to try it.

"I was very particular to have it prepared strictly according to directions, and used good, rich cream. It was very nice indeed, and about bedtime I said to the members of the family that I believed I felt better. One of them laughed and said, 'That's another of mother's notions,' but the notion has not left me yet.

"I continued to improve right along after leaving off coffee and taking Postum, and now after three years' use I feel so well that I am almost young again. I know Postum was the cause of the change in my health and I cannot say too much in its favor. I wish I could persuade all nervous people to use it."

o heaven?" One student answered, " ere shall be no more sorrow there." nother answered, "There shall be no n e death." Another, "They shall see h face." But Thomas, who was the y ngest of all, said: "And his ser- v ts shall serve him." Brighter than h ven itself, Jesus saw the time when tl five hundred disciples of his e hly life should be the five hundred n ions of professing Christians of o twentieth century.

; is not too much to say that he saw a sion of the great World Missionary C ference held only last June in Edin- b gh, truly a cosmopolitan assembly, a Parliament of Man," intent on de- v ng means for the betterment of the h an race. It certainly was a gath- e g that brought nearer the kingdom o eaven on earth.

he time when that conference r hed its highest tide was the day w n "Co-operation and Unity" was c sidered. The discussion was pre- c ed by an invocation service; the g at hall with its galleries was p ked with men and women from all p ts of the earth, representing one h dred and sixty denominations and r gious associations. Instantly silence f upon all and the silence was filled w h God. Suddenly, through the s nce came a voice, vibrating with f ing, speaking the prayer of the I d, "that they may be one, that the w ld may believe."

here was not a dissenting voice in t discussions which followed on the p cticability of co-operation and u ty in the missionary work of the w ld. Sir Andrew Fraser, late Gov- e or-General of Bengal, said: "The a inment of unity would double the r ources of the Church without the a ition of one worker." He also said, "- operation, when it begins, has a g at tendency to increase." Mr. C ng Ching-yi, a Chinaman who s ke excellent English, said: "Denom- i tionalism never interested the Chi- ne mind; that China loved the ideal o unity in the home, in the nation, al in religion." Bishop Brent said t t "aloofness means a poor and n med life."

Dr. Campbell Gibson expressed the b ef that the body of Christ has m y members, but that he could not t k of a body with its members sev- e d from one another. Rev. James T. E ton quoted a Mohammedan leader w o had said to him that "Mohamme- d s had looked upon religion as a g at barrier to keep the Turkish E pire apart, but now they were l rning that religion might be the g atest bond to combine them to- g her into a great fellowship under t fatherhood of a common God."

As a result of this amicable discus- s n, unanimous action was taken to p vide a permanent international m ssionary committee, which should be composed of representatives of the different church boards, whose duty it should be to conserve all work in missionary fields along its "far-flung battle line." This means more than co-operation or federation; it means unity in Christ. It was stated in the conference that "in round numbers 1,000,000,000 of the human race were yet to accept the message of salvation." How great, therefore, is the need of co-operation and unity!

Dr. Arthur J. Brown said: "Edinburgh has been identified with a gathering that would be considered by future historians as the most remarkable assemblage of the people of God that this world has yet seen." And it is fitting that such a meeting should have been held in Edinburgh, because Scotland had sent Mungo Park and Livingstone to open up the dark continent of Africa, and the Scotchman Mackay had established a native Christian state in Uganda, and Scotland had led the way in showing what industrial missions could do to show the heathen the power of Christianity. It was Scotland, through Dr. Paton, that had spread Christianity in the South Seas. It was Scotland that led the way in India by establishing colleges for the higher education of Hindus. It is not to be wondered at that Edinburgh looked upon this great conference somewhat in the light of a memorial to her missionary heroes.

The closing words of the conference were sung in the following hymn:

Now blessed be the Lord our God,
The God of Israel,
For he alone doth wondrous works
In glory that excel;
And blessed be his glorious name
To all eternity;
The whole earth let his glory fill;
Amen, so let it be.

EXTRA READING MATTER

F you will look over the July issues of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD you will find that seven more pages of reading matter were published during that month than were published in the July issues of last year.

In seven pages of reading matter there are twenty-eight columns and in e h column there are approximately 110 lines with an average of seven words ta line. So that we were enabled to give our readers last month 21,560 extra rds of reading matter without extra charge. This is interesting because it l ves that aside from the commercial advantage which our advertising columns f r the reader they make it possible for us to produce a bigger and better CRISTIAN HERALD than it would be possible to publish without them; and as the a vertising pages grow with the season, we will be able to give more and more r ding matter to our subscribers without extra charge.

This is only another advantage of having the best kind of advertising a pear in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. We have endeavored to show these advant ges in a number of specific instances, but here is an instance whereby every r der benefits by the advertising columns whether the advertiser is patronized c not.

Whenever any of our subscribers is defrauded by an advertiser in THE CRISTIAN HERALD we will make good the claim, provided that the subscriber, w o must be of record, has mentioned THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in writing to the a vertiser, and provided the claim is made to us within two months of the date o the appearance of the advertisement.

Light Weight, Stylish and Soft

Please don't judge genuine Holeproof Hose by those that are simply guaranteed. "Holeproof" would be, by far, the finest hose on the market even with the guarantee eliminated. Holeproof Hosiery
FOR MEN WOMEN AND CHILDREN
All the newest colors now on show

Our yarn costs an average of 70c per lb. We could use 30c yarn, but the hose wouldn't be soft and attractive like "Holeproof." We spend $33,000 a year merely for inspection. So every pair is right. Six pairs of men's "Holeproof" guaranteed for six months cost $1.50. The extra light weights cost $2. The mercerized—finished like silk—cost $3. One color or the newest colors assorted. We sterilize each pair twice in the making, so the colors are fast—the hose sanitary.

We don't know where else you can get hose like these, though you pay twice what we ask for "Holeproof." They are made for women and children, too. Six pairs of women's hose cost $2 (mercerized $3). The children's hose cost $2 for six pairs.

Sold in Your Town The genuine "Holeproof" is sold in your town. We'll tell you the dealers' names on request or ship direct where we have no dealers, charges prepaid on receipt of price.

MUSIC LESSONS FREE

In Your Own Home

In order to make our home study courses known in your locality we will give you—absolutely free—96 lessons for either Piano, Organ, Violin, Guitar, Banjo, Mandolin, or Cornet. In return we ask that you recommend our Institute to your friends after you learn to play. It matters not whether you are a beginner or an advanced pupil, the lessons will be made suitable to your need. It is not necessary that you know one note from another. The lessons are so simple and easy that any person or little child who can read English can learn them. You will receive one lesson weekly, and your only expense during the time you take the lessons will be the cost of postage and the music you use, which is small. Thousands have learned by mail and you can do the same.

Don't say you cannot learn music, but send for our free booklet and tuition offer. It will be sent by return mail free.

Questions and Answers

In forwarding MSS. to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, enclose stamped envelopes for return, if unavailable.

B. F., Rahway, N. J. We like THE CHRISTIAN HERALD better and better every season. It gives a rich variety of reading matter full of accurate information, fresh from expert sources in home and foreign fields. Though not as large as some weeklies, it is far more entertaining and helpful than most.

If you compare our present issues, month by month, with those of previous years, you will find that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD now gives more matter for the general reader than it ever did. During July we gave seven more pages of reading matter than during the same month in 1909. These seven pages represent 28 columns, of 110 lines each, averaging seven words per line. This means an aggregate of 21,560 extra words of reading matter over the same month a year ago. As the season advances, the space devoted to reading matter will be considerably increased.

Mrs. W. H., Rawdon, Can. 1. When was God first called "Our Father" in the Bible? 2. Have we any proof that God is the Father of "the wicked"?

1. See Jer. 31: 9; Isa. 63: 16. The Old Testament claimed God as peculiarly the God and Father of the Jews. It remained for the Messianic advent to proclaim the universal Fatherhood of God. The title, "Our Father," had its place in the liturgy of the tabernacle and temple ever since the law was proclaimed from Mount Sinai, and only obtained a wider significance on the conversion of the Gentiles. 2. If God be accepted as the Creator of all, in that sense is he the Father of all. Disobedience does not make a child any the less relation of its parents. (Acts 17: 26-29.)

Mrs. M. N., Fort Pierce, Fla. 1. What are the conditions of the Bahama Islands as regards the intelligence and morality of the people, the climate, noxious insects, etc.?

The people of the Bahama Islands (population in 1901, 53,735) compare favorably in intelligence and morality with those of other semi-tropical countries. The native and colored portion enormously outnumber the whites. There are several Wesleyan, Baptist, Episcopal and Presbyterian churches in the islands, but few, if any, Roman Catholic. There is not much interest in education, though fairly good schools are provided. The climate is salubrious and equable, the thermometer ranging from a maximum of 88 degrees in summer to a minimum of 66 degrees in winter. Fruits, especially pineapples, flourish there. The soil, though thin, is fertile. There are fewer noxious insects than are found on the continents in the same latitude.

G. E. C., Grinnell, Ia. 1. If good people go to heaven immediately after death, then what is the use of a resurrection time followed by a judgment day? 2. Explain John 3: 13 and John 5: 28, 29.

1. The first question is based on a wholly materialistic conception of the after-life, which prevailed previous to the Messianic advent, and from which the world of Christendom has not wholly emancipated itself yet. Only as associated with the physical and material is spirit cognizant of time and place. Jesus had to use these forms of speech in order to make his teachings comprehensible to the people; but on many occasions he strove to raise and enlighten their minds to a clearer spiritual understanding. God is Spirit, incomprehensible, indescribable. God is in heaven, yet God is everywhere, hence heaven is everywhere. See Matt. 6: 33, Luke 17: 20, 21, Luke 23: 43 and other passages. From these it must be evident that by the term "heaven" is meant a state or condition of existence. Resurrection and final judgment were taught in Egypt centuries before the days of Moses; were in a modified form incorporated in the teachings of the Hebrews, and so passed down into the doctrines of the Christian Church. They are an appanage of the belief in immortality, and mark the boundary to which the human mind can soar. But when we come to question the why and wherefore, we are seeking a deeper revelation of God's purposes than he has been pleased to give us. 2. The foregoing will afford explanation of the passages which you quote. John 3: 13 must not be separated from its preceding verse. No one can explain or throw light on spiritual conditions without having first entered into such spirituality for himself or herself, neither can such teaching or explanation be understood or accepted by any who themselves have not so entered. This is why materialistic ideas of a future state still so universally prevail. See Eph. 4: 9, 10.

Mrs. J. E. W., Clark, S. D. Please tell me something of mission work in the West Indies.

John Wesley preached in 1758 in the house of Nathaniel Gilbert in Antigua. It was the beginning of a great work among Mr. Gilbert's family and slaves. In 1786 Dr. Coke went to Antigua, became interested in the work there, and used his influence to have missionaries sent there in 1787. In a few years, almost every West Indian colony had been reached. In 1885, the British Conference, contrary to the judgment of the Missionary Committee, turned over all the work of the society to two conferences, a Western, including Jamaica, Haiti, San Domingo, Panama, and Costa Rica; and an Eastern, including Antigua, St. Kitts, St. Vincent, Barbados, Trinidad and British Guiana. All of these sections have suffered heavily in late years, and they are to be brought back under the care of the British Conference.

D. S. H., Marengo, O. Please explain the last chapter of Malachi.

The concluding verse of that chapter fully explains the antecedent verses. They are a prophecy of the work of the Messiah, and correspond with Matt. 3: 12. Righteousness shall consume all wickedness off the face of the earth, is steadily doing so at the present day, and will go on doing so till the kingdom of God shall be established in the hearts of all men. Then shall appear "the new heavens and the new earth," prified and redeemed unto all eternity. In all prophecy relating to the coming kingdom, we must seek interpretation along spiritual lines.

H. W. H., Bridgeport, Conn. What is the best author on the Reformation?

The following are good books on the history of the Reformation: T. M. Lindsay's Luther and the Reformation, vol. II of the Cambridge Modern History; Fisher's History of the Reformation is a good, brief manual on the subject. D'Aubigne's is also a standard.

J. F. A., Columbia, Pa. Please explain verses 23 to 26 of Luke 11.

Salvation from sin in its entirety is not usually a matter of a moment. It requires faith and perseverance. Habits once formed are not readily thrown off. The immediate resolve is followed by a period of unrest, and there is danger that in renouncing any particular evil habit, others may be contracted which may prove very much worse before their bondage is perceived. The renunciation must be whole and complete, the strength to do which can only be found in the Saviour.

H. C., Crockett, Tex. 1. Can a man appeal to the State health board to protect him from the craving of whisky after it becomes a disease? 2. Is not this craving often inherited? 3. What is the mortality from consumption, yellow fever and smallpox? 4. Why should not some philanthropist take some of our prisoners and establish colonies in Alaska, the Philippines and the Sandwich Islands?

1. In New York State there is no free public institution for the cure of intemperance. The Legislature has recently passed a bill to establish one, but it is not yet built. There are many private ones, but they are generally expensive. 2. Yes. 3. In 1907 the deaths from tuberculosis in the United States numbered about 150,000. In 1905 the deaths from yel fever in the so-called "registration area," cluding fifteen States and fifty-four ci (population of all about 61,000,000) numbe 438. In 1908 the deaths from smallpox in same area (which includes the only secti where reliable records were kept) numbered 4. It is not necessary, in order to populate new possessions, that criminals should exiled thither. There are plenty of law-abid citizens to volunteer for such service, and i always good policy to get the best. In for times good men were not so ready to bec pioneers.

V. L., Platform, O. Is tobacco used for other purposes than chewing and smoki

President Taft Arriving in His Launch

The President Drives to the Monument

OUR TRIBUTE TO THE PILGRIMS

SEVERAL monuments have been erected in this country to the memory of the Pilgrims who were the first white settlers of New England, who crossed the ocean to an unknown continent in quest of religious liberty, and who, with their descendants, have played a most important part in the development of our nation. It has remained, however, for the present summer to witness the completion of the largest, costliest, and in many respects most significant memorial yet reared to that hardy and devout band which came over in the Mayflower. This latest evidence of the national esteem and gratitude earned by the pioneers who first reached our Northern coast is in the form of a massive and lofty granite tower, which ranks second only to the Washington National Monument as the greatest structure of solid masonry in the land. President Roosevelt laid the cornerstone of this monument about three years ago. On August 5, President Taft formally dedicated the imposing shaft. The event was made an occasion of great ceremony. An imposing naval fleet, including ten battleships, assembled for the dedication. It was the first time President Taft had reviewed the fleet, and he entered into the ceremonies with keen interest. In his speech at the dedication of the monument he paid high tribute to the Pilgrims and the Puritans. He said in part:

"Here, 290 years ago, a band of 100 Pilgrims, in a small crowded and leaking vessel, first saw their new home. This was the first attempt made by men seeking political and religious independence to secure an asylum in America where they might escape the fussy, meddling, narrow and tyrannical restraint imposed by the first of the Stuarts. They were not of the nobility, they were not of the upper middle class. They were of the yeomanry or the farmer class. Their ministers were university bred men, but the rest were humble, God-fearing persons who were avowed nonconformists and had been persecuted as such in their homes in the eastern part of England. . . . [Here he described the religious conditions in Europe which led to the movement and told of the hardships and privations encountered by the colonists in the new world]. The spirit which prompted them to brave the seas, to land on this forbidding coast in winter and to live here has made the history of this country what it is. It prompted and fought the Revolutionary War. It welcomed and fought the Civil War and has furnished the United States the highest ideals of moral life and political citizenship. We need not defend the lack of liberality which in their early history the Pilgrims may have shown those differing with them in religious belief and creed. Out of the logic of their processes intellectually there came religious freedom, while in the energy of their religious faith they uncomplainingly met the hardships that were inevitable in search for liberty.

"It is meet, therefore, that the United States, as well as the State of Massachusetts, should unite in placing here a memorial to the Pilgrims. The warships that are here with their cannon to testify to its national character typify the strength of that government whose people have derived much from the spirit and example of the heroic band.

"Governor Bradford, Elder Brewster, Captain Miles Standish are the types of men in whom as ancestors either by blood or by education and example as citizens the American people may well take pride. This magnificent monument will fittingly remind the traveler by sea of the beginnings of New England and note the fact that those whose spirit of liberty was to persist for centuries, even to the foundation and preservation of our great Republic, here first saw the land and here first put foot upon the shore."

The Newly Dedicated Monument

In addition to the address by the President, notable speeches were made by President Emeritus Charles W. Eliot of Harvard, Senator Henry Cabot Lodge and others.

The new monument is located at the little fishing town of Provincetown, Mass., on the tip end of Cape Cod, where the Pilgrims first landed, and where they remained for a short time before they proceeded along the coast to their more permanent abiding-place at Plymouth. The new monument is designed primarily to commemorate the advent in the New World of its most notable pioneers of civil and religious liberty.

But aside from its function in marking the Pilgrims' first landing-place, the new monument is designed to constitute an enduring tribute to the "compact" signed by the Pilgrims while their ship lay at Provincetown—a mutual agreement of the first settlers that has been aptly denominated the "forerunner of the Declaration of Independence." The signing of this compact is commemorated by means of a massive tablet, set in the side of the monument near the base.

The new monument, in connection with which two of our Presidents have played a prominent part, cost about $90,000, of which sum $40,000 was contributed by the national government; $25,000 by the State of Massachusetts and the remainder by popular subscription. The monument is 252 feet in height, but it is set on the brow of a hill which gives it an altitude of 347 feet above the harbor and will render it a beacon for mariners many miles at sea. The monument is, in one sense, a notable engineering marvel. The structure, weighing some 15,000,000 pounds, is set upon the sand—there is nothing else on Cape Cod as far as the eye can reach—yet it has not settled a fraction of an inch since its construction and it shows not the slightest vibration, even in the strongest gales that sweep over this crooked finger of sand, with a velocity of eighty-four miles per hour.

"And the Iron Did Swim"

TEXT—II. Kings 6:6

"WAIT a moment," you say. "Iron will not swim. I cast a piece of iron into the water and saw it sink like lead," and you may say that the statement of the text is contrary to all natural laws. And then you might go on to assume that if this text is untrue, the story of Elisha may not be genuine; and if you take Elisha out of the Old Testament, you can very easily part company with Elijah. But you have evidently forgotten the first statement of the text, "And the man of God said." We are not dealing to-day with natural law, we are dealing with the supernatural; and I am presenting to you a story out of a Book in which the marvelous is always coming to pass. I should think it would be a very easy thing to make an ax-head swim as compared with holding the winds in your fist, and God can do that. I really believe it would be a very trifling matter to bring a bit of iron to the surface of the water when compared with holding the seas in the hollow of your hand, and God can do that. The iron did swim. God said it in his Word, and God always speaks the truth. I like the setting of the text. The house of the sons of the prophets seems to have been too small, and so the sons of the prophets go out to secure material for its enlargement. It is a kind of co-operative piece of work, and these men as they go along are carrying axes, and with the axes they are chopping down the trees. One man seems to be poorer than the others, for he is working with a borrowed ax. It may be that the ax was faulty, it may be that the laborer himself was overzealous—we do not know—but when he was working away, suddenly the ax-head slipped away from the handle, bounded into the water, and sank out of sight. And the man in great embarrassment turned to the man of God, saying, "Alas, master! for it was borrowed." "And the man of God said, Where fell it? And he showed him the place. And he cut down a stick and cast it in thither; and the iron did swim."

The Elijah Mantle

This illustration is one of the miracles of Elisha. There is a very sharp contrast between the miracles of Elisha and those of Elijah. Elijah seemed even to do great things, Elisha the commonplace, every-day things. Elisha and Elijah walk along together. They come to Bethel, to Gilgal, to the fords of Jordan, and Elijah turns to Elisha, saying, "Better tarry here, for the Lord will take me away from you," and he would not. And the sons of the prophets came out and said, "Elisha, better tarry here, for the Lord will take away your master." And he said, "As the Lord liveth and as thy soul liveth, I will not leave thee." And Elijah looking upon him said, "Elisha, what will you have me give unto thee?" And he said, "O master, a double portion of thy spirit." And Elijah said, "You have asked a hard thing, but if you keep your eyes fixed upon me, you shall have it."

They came to the Jordan, and Elijah took off his old mantle and smote the waters, and dry-shod they went over on the other side. Suddenly, the skies brightened, and a chariot of fire and steeds of fire appeared. Then the whirlwind was on, and Elijah, overpowered for the moment, stood looking at Elisha. Then stretching forth his hands, I imagine I hear Elisha shout, "My father, my father, the chariot of Israel and the horsemen thereof!" And Elijah took his old mantle, leaned out from the whirlwind, held it for a second, and then dropped it. It came fluttering down through the air until it was on the shoulders of Elisha. And he has received his reward. And note this, he did not take the master's mantle and wrap it around him and say, "Isn't this comfortable!" Many a man has received the Holy Ghost in the same way, and lost him, because of such a spirit. Elisha did not wrap his master's mantle around him and say, "I shall take this back and keep it as a matter of pride." Many a man has received a blessing and lost it for this very reason. He used the master's mantle in the same way that Elijah had used it. He smote the waters, then came over unto the other shore. Now, from this time on his miracles are homely.

He hears of a certain town where there is a bitter spring, and he sweetens the waters, and makes the town more habitable and the land more fertile. He learns of a certain woman who is troubled because of debt, and he goes into her house and asks her regarding her possessions. She has only a cruse of oil. He tells her to go through the village borrowing empty vessels. When she brings them he tells her to pour out of the cruse, and so long as she had empty vessels she could pour out oil. Then she sold the oil and paid her debts, and her home was filled with rejoicing. He is told by the Shunamite woman that her boy is dead. He comes down from the mountain, makes his way across the plain, goes up into the prophet's chamber where the boy is lying, puts his hands to the boy's hands, his eyes to the boy's eyes, his mouth to the boy's mouth, and then prays, and the boy lives again. This is Elisha. And so when the man finds only the ax-handle in his hand, and the ax-head gone, it is only natural for him to turn to this man of God, and say, "Alas, master! for it was borrowed"; and for the man of God to say, "Where fell it?" "And he showed him the place, and he cut down a stick and cast it in thither, and the iron did swim."

The Miracles of Jesus

If this were the only instance of the kind in the Scriptures, I might question it, but the Bible is full of stories like this. I turn to the New Testament, and I find there the story of the woman who for eighteen years had been bowed down with an infirmity. She could in nowise lift herself up. She had spent all her living on physicians, and could be healed by none of them. She was a dwarf in stature. I have imagined her sometimes when alone in her home, when no eye could look upon her, trying to straighten out her arm, and she could not. But one day Jesus sees her stooping over in her infirmity, and with all his divine power he speaks, saying, "Woman, thou art loosed," and she stood up. The iron did swim. He is always bringing these things to pass. I see a woman taken in her sin. She is being hounded by men, who are professing great virtue themselves. They are attempting to stone her with stones, and she is running like a frightened deer. I imagine her stumbling and falling. I imagine a stone striking her. I see her rise from her fallen position with the blood blinding her eyes. She is hastening on when suddenly she sees Jesus. I think I see her fall at his feet. Now I want you to notice that. The law condemned her; the world stoned her; but Jesus forgave her. And when they came up to him they found him writing in the sand. They say that when the woman came to him as an impure woman, he bowed his face because he was a pure man, and he wrote abstractedly in the sand. I do not believe it. I am sure it is not so. There is an old legend which declares that when Jesus bent over to write he was writing on the sand the name of a man in the crowd, and this man bent over to read his own name. And the rest of the sentence was this: "So and So is himself an extortioner," and the man drops the stone in his hand and goes away. Jesus writes another name: "So and So is himself an adulterer," and fifty men drop the stones in their hands and flee from Jesus.

Instances in Every-day Life

He continues writing name after name, and man after man leaves until at last, lifting up his eyes and seeing only the woman at his feet, and the men all scattered, he says, "Woman, where are thine accusers? Doth no man accuse thee?" And she said, "No man, Lord." And he said, "Neither do I accuse thee. Go and sin no more." And she stood up. And the iron did swim.

But if any of you worldly wise people are saying to me to-day, "But that is in the Bible," then I will take an illustration of recent occurrence. At a meeting like this in a city in Canada, there came into the audience a man blinded by drink, held captive by drugs for twenty-nine years. He had been a slave to opium, and to cocaine, and to morphine. Mr. Asher spoke to him. His heart was touched. And I saw that man walk down in the presence of 4,000 people, climb up on to the high platform by my side, and say, "Friends, I am climbing up out of hell, and you must help me," and, although he was clad in rags, there came up to him a beautifully dressed woman, who said, "My husband will take you to our home this evening."

The other day there came to us a letter written by the Presbyterian minister, who said, "I wish you could see our man. His face is shining. I wish yo could hear him speak. He is filled with the powe of God. I wish you could have heard him lead ou meeting last night. Scores of people were impresse and many of them converted." And the iron d swim.

"Ah, but that is Canada," you say. Then let m take you to another land. On one of the first day that we were in Melbourne, Australia, I heard a ra at my door in the hotel. I said, "Come in," and frightened face appeared for a moment at the doo I have scarcely been able to get that face out of m vision. A note was handed in, and I read, "Dea Sir, I have been a drunkard for four years. I hav tried my best to overcome the awful disease an passion, but I cannot. Please pray for me." The the person appeared at the door again for a momer and she said, "I came just to see that you got it i your hand," and then she was gone. I scarcel passed through a meeting after that in Melbourn that I did not see her face, sometimes with a loo of stolid indifference on it, sometimes it seemed t me bathed with tears, and she almost on the poir of decision. One night I saw her stand in one of th congregations, and with trembling tones say tha through the day she had gotten the victory, tha under the power of the singing she had seen Jesus and with the memory of her sweet mother she ha made one great effort by the help of God. She wa in our meetings after that clothed in her right minc All the look of womanhood back; all the power o virtue back; all the strength of Christian grace back The iron did swim.

The Message for You

But my message is also for the man, and for th woman, who may be a member of the church. Ther is many a man in the church to-day, and many a woman, too, in the predicament of the man wh lost the ax-head. The man with the ax-handle i his hand could have gone on apparently choppin wood. He could have raised the ax-handle an brought it down, and the man fifty feet away woul not have known that he was working without a ax-head. But I was raised in the country, and know that it is a good deal more difficult to swing an ax-handle without an ax-head than to swing on with an ax-head. And it is a good deal more diffi cult to keep up the form of religion than to live th real thing, and many of you are keeping up the form You are working without an ax-head Who are th people that are doing this? First, some of us wh are ministers. There was a day when God spoke through our ministry. There was a day when, ris ing to plead, there was a passion in our words. There was a day when, as we proclaimed Jesus Christ, men and women flocked to the mercy seat There was a day when, as we preached, we could see him, and people knew that we saw him. And now we preach the same sermons, and we use the same illustrations, and we work the same methods, and there is no power. And there are church offi cers here who in times gone by testified for Jesus Christ. In their homes they had family altars. They spoke the names of their children in their peti tions. They went to the church, and as they rose to speak everybody gave the closest attention. All who heard knew that they were men of God. And to-day the altars are gone, and power is gone with them, and they have not been in the church nor at the prayer-meeting for a month, and they have no power. And there are Christian people listening to me to-day, whose experience in other days could best be told in the words of the hymn, "Oh, happy day that fixed my choice." And if there is any other hymn that could write their story, it is this one: "Were the whole realm of nature mine, that were an offering far too small. Love so amazing, so divine, demands my life, my soul, my all." And you are without power to-day. You are not a soul-winner. You have lost your influence over your husband, you have lost your influence on your children, you have lost your influence in the church and in the city. The ax-head is gone. No power!

I have only one thing to say in conclusion. My message to-day is for the man who is not a Christian. He is the man deep down in sin, away in the blackness of despair. He is surely a submerged one. How are you going to get him up? Of course, in these days of worldly-wise men we have all sorts of suggestions. The political reformer comes along, and tells us that we need better political conditions. Of course we do, but they can never take the place of salvation. The sociologist appears, and says that all the systems of men are wrong. He tells us to change our economic systems and men will be better. Of course they will, but all the sociology in the world cannot save the sinner. Then there are others who tell us that we only think the ax-head is off any way, and we need just think it is on, and to proceed to use the ax-handle, and we will be all right again. Will we, indeed!

I declare to-day that there is no way to lift the sinner up except by the drawing power of Jesus Christ. Preach him; sing him; live him. That is the secret. Then there is hope. I heard S. H. Hadley say that one night there came into the Water Street Mission in New York a man who, because of his sin, was bent down like a dwarf. Naturally he would stand as tall as I, but in his sin he was bowed down till he was not more than four feet high. Sin had touched his tongue, and he could not speak plainly. He dropped down on the only knee he could bend, buried his face in his hands for a moment, and said, "O God, O God," and suddenly the bands that held him were snapped, and he stood up erect as I am standing now. In the Water Street Mission at the end of the year, they always allow the men to celebrate an anniversary. When this man's anniversary came around, he did not read the lesson. He let another read it. He let another announce the hymn. But when it came to the time of testimony, he bowed down as he had been dwarfed in sin, and then, with every eye looking at him, he rose up and stood erect as Christ had set him free, his face shining, his eyes filled with tears. It is that sort of salvation I preach. Bound with a passion, you can be free. Held with a sin, you may be forgiven. Will you turn? Will you turn? I know where you made your mistake. You neglected your mother's pleading, you resisted your father's praying, you scorned your minister's preaching. That is the way you lost it.

With this I close. Up in the Alps I saw here and there a black cross, and I said to my guide, "What does that mean?" He said, "It means that when a traveler slips to death on such a point as this, they raise a black cross." I wonder if where you are sitting today there is to be a black cross this afternoon because you reject Christ! I used that illustration in my old church in Philadelphia, and an old Scotch woman came up to me, and said, "Pastor, when you told that story a man in front of me dropped his head in his hands, and began to sob, saying, 'Nay, but I yield, I yield. I can hold out no more.' "I wonder," she said, "if where he sat there could be placed a red cross?" So I plead with you to turn to Christ. What is it to be today? Black or red? Yes or no? Life or death? Acceptance or rejection? God help you.

TAKING YOUR FACE TO CHURCH

By Rev. J. M. Farrar, D.D.*

THE closing days of vacation are a good time to think about turning your face to the School of the Soul. Vacation is a school for your body. After vacation you go to a school for your intellect. We are sorry for the boy or girl whose face is unknown in these schools. God gave to you the Church, built it on the rock of truth, and gave you sixty-six books, called the Bible, to read and study. The Church of Christ is the School of the Soul. Surely not one of my Juniors is unknown by face in the church. In our text Paul writes about churches where his face had not been seen. The reason was because he had not been near enough to attend the services. The church where Paul lived and the church in every place he visited knew his face. Your pastor may not know the name of every boy and girl who hears him preach, but he knows every face. Your face is of more value than is your name. Will you resolve at the close of your vacation to let your face be well known in your church? The School of the Soul makes and keeps the face beautiful.

A GREAT painter, Leonardo da Vinci, spent several years in painting a picture of the Last Supper of our Saviour. He went to a church to find the face of a child from which to paint the face of the Christ. He selected Pietro, who had a beautiful face. Several years passed while the painter worked on this picture. He had painted the face of Christ and of all his apostles except one, that of Judas. Day after day he walked the streets of Milan looking for a face from which to paint a likeness of Judas. At last he found a wicked man whose face, marked by sin, revealed a bad heart. While painting this face he learned that it was the same face he had used when painting the face of Christ. Pietro had gone to Rome and lived with wicked people, and grew to be a wicked man. He had lost his soul and ruined his face.

IN the following story find one other reason for attending the School of the Soul:

"But, mother, a fellow doesn't get much good going to church when the whole business bores him."

"My son," said Mr. Stevens, "I have something to tell you.

"When I was a child," he continued, "I promised my mother to attend church every Sabbath morning, and I did. For several months it was a trial and a bore, but it brought me one of the greatest blessings of my life. A person can gain nothing but good from regular attendance at church, and I expect it from you as long as you have respect for my authority, whether you like it or not."

This sounded very stern, but Mary touched her father's arm. "Won't you tell us about it?" she asked.

"There's not much to tell. I went to church when it rained, and when it snowed, when the boys were amazed, and when they ridiculed. I suppose it did seem queer to them, for I was not a Christian."

"You were a lover of your mother," said Mrs. Stevens.

Her husband flashed her a grateful look. "I was," he briefly said.

"BUT, father," persisted Mary, "you have not told us about the blessing it brought you."

"I had a boy who went to church with me. I don't know why I was such a fool as to go all alone at first. I could have found some one to accompany me, I'm sure.

"When you don't like to attend church," he continued, "take some one with you. It helps matters wondrously."

There was silence for a minute.

"But about the blessing," said Mary.

Mr. Stevens smiled. "You'd call it a very commonplace blessing," he said, "but it made me over again, and gave me a new purpose in life. My son, do you know of one instance where your influence has made any person better—drawn him from evil ways?"

"No, father," said the young man, in a low tone.

"Then don't quit church-going yet for a while. You have not got your eyes open."

"But how about the blessing?" inquired Mary.

"H'm! I found out that I had been recommended by my teacher to this boy as a companion who would help him to quit his evil ways." Mr. Stevens was transformed. His eyes flashed and his voice trembled, and his face was all aglow. "Think of it! I was not even a Christian, and yet that boy who had fallen among wild companions, and sought help, was sent to me, and I knew nothing of it. I thank God and my mother that I lived straight in those days."

"AND your companion reformed?" asked Mary.

"He did, and he and I joined the church together the following Easter. That's what came of church attendance, even though I took no pleasure in it. The Sunday School teacher told me that all he knew of me, except in the Sunday School class, was that for three months he had seen me in church every Sabbath morning, with no one to urge it, nor even any one to accompany me."

Mr. Stevens arose and pushed back his chair. "My son," he said, "stick to the church. Some day it will surely bring you a heart blessing which will sweeten the hard places of your life." This boy was not unknown by face in the church.

* Pastor First Reformed Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. TEXT: "Unknown by face unto the churches." Gal. 1:22.

The Nailed Post

AN English correspondent of Mr. John C. Havemeyer of Yonkers recently sent him this instructive anecdote, which he has forwarded to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for publication: A father had an unruly boy, not amenable to discipline—inattentive to commands and, apparently, untouched by love. The father was greatly grieved, but bore it patiently for a long time (just as our Father did with us). At last he called the boy to him, and pointing to a post which had been fixed in the garden for some decorative purpose, said, "My dear son, I am going to drive a nail in that post and leave it there every time you are guilty of an act of disobedience." Very soon a nail was driven, and then another and another. Every nail and every blow of the hammer upon a nail was a pang for the father's heart, but only indifference for the heart of the son. At last the post was becoming thickly studded with nails. When it began to look as though not many more nails could be driven, the son became thoughtful and began to see his conduct in its true light; then followed sorrow, repentance and obedience, and the nail-driving ceased. The now happy father called his son and told him of the joy which filled his heart, and then added, "From this time, I will withdraw a nail to mark every act of obedience and loving duty."

Soon a nail was withdrawn, and another and another, until a day came when the last nail was drawn, and the delighted father called his son and said, "See, my dear son, all the nails are drawn." To the father's surprise, the son wept bitterly. The father gathered his son in his arms, pressed him to his breast and said, "My darling boy, why do you weep? I thought you would be so glad that all the nails are gone." The weeping boy said, amid his sobs, "Yes, father, the nails are gone, but the holes are there." Yes, it was even so; the father might draw the nails, but no power could get rid of the holes—the effect of the nails. Does not this illustrate those wonderful words of our blessed Lord, "Ye must be born again"? The post is no longer fit for the garden; it is permanently, forever defaced; to plug up the holes is only to emphasize the holes; no, there must be a new post. And so, dear brother, you and I don't want to go there, where he is, defaced with nail holes, however lovingly the Father draws us to his breast. We don't want eternally to wear such hideous scars of sin; how much better it will be, to be as he purposes we shall be: "Like him; for we shall see him as he is."

Work to Preserve Roads

EXPERIMENTS were made during the summer of 1909 by the Department of Agriculture at Washington, D. C., Youngstown, O., and Ithaca, N. Y., with different preparations for the prevention of dust and the preservation of roads.

At Washington, waste sulphite liquor was used on a macadam driveway subjected to light traffic. Sulphite liquor is a dense sticky liquid produced in the manufacture of wood pulp. It was applied in mixtures with water in varying proportions. The results show that it has but little value as a permanent road treatment, but that in concentrated form it may be classed as a temporary or semi-permanent dust preventive and road binder.

At Youngstown, blast furnace slag was used alone and in different combinations with lime, sulphite liquor, and tar to determine the best method of utilizing slag for road construction. While sufficient time has not elapsed since these experiments were made to show definite and permanent results, it is believed that they will be valuable in determining what combinations will produce the best road.

At Ithaca, tar, oil, artificial asphalt preparations, brick, cement, and slag were used with varying results.

Mayor Gaynor's Struggle for Life

LAST week's CHRISTIAN HERALD contained a brief announcement of the startling municipal tragedy in New York, when Mayor William J. Gaynor was shot down on the deck of the steamship Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse by an ex-city employee. It was at first thought that the Mayor's wound, which was in the neck below and behind the right ear, might prove fatal; but to the surprise of his physicians and the delight of his friends and sympathizers all over the country, the patient rallied in a most wonderful manner. He never really lost consciousness, and within forty-eight hours after the shooting, the doctors entertained the hope that except for the possibility of blood-poisoning—which they did not anticipate—the Mayor would soon recover.

Mayor Gaynor Supported by Friends the Moment After the Shooting

Four eminent physicians were in constant attendance upon Mayor Gaynor during the first two days after the shooting: Doctors William J. Arlitz, George E. Brewer, George V. Stewart, and Charles M. Dowd. Two more were added later. At the first examination they thought that the bullet had divided into two fragments, one apparently located "in the floor of the mouth, near the ramus bone, on the left side, and the other near the point of entrance." Later, however, it was found, by examination with the radiograph, that it had not split, but was lodged in the "vault of the pharynx" and easily accessible, though removal was considered inexpedient. After the first slight flow of blood from the throat, there was no hemorrhage. The Mayor could converse without difficulty and was not in pain. After being taken to St. Mary's Hospital in Hoboken, he was visited by his wife. Mrs. Gaynor and her son were accommodated in the hospital in order to be near the sufferer. The Mayor's calmness and presence of mind surprised all around him.

At the time of the shooting, he was probably the least agitated of any person in the group on the steamer's deck. While he was being carried down the gangplank to the ambulance, he seemed to share the general impression that he had been mortally wounded, for he said faintly through the folds of his bandages, "Tell the people good-by"—his thoughts even at that critical moment reverting to his public duties and responsibilities. This was the only expression of the kind that fell from his lips, however; for his sound health and remarkable fortitude soon enabled him to put aside all fear of personal consequences, and his conversation thereafter was confident and even cheerful. After the first shock had safely passed, his condition, to the surprise of his physicians, became almost normal. The doctors' bulletins continued to be favorable. The patient took nourishment and seemed to enjoy it, and he had no difficulty in swallowing the food. Thirty-six hours after the shooting, his temperature was 100 2-5, and unless complications ensued, the best results were looked for. He was making a splendid fight for his life.

To the few visitors who were admitted to his sickroom in the hospital, he spoke cheerfully and confidently. In a humorous way, he said that the doctors were not giving him enough to eat and that the bowls of chicken broth were "smaller now than when he was a boy." Two days after the shooting, there was no trace of hemorrhage; the patient slept well, ate with relish and conversed without difficulty. His physicians were encouraged to believe that he was on the road to recovery and that his splendid health had carried him safely over a crisis which, to most men of his age, would have been a very serious one. He chatted pleasantly with his official associates and his relatives, discussed his European travels, and even talked of going to an Adirondack camp after he got out of the doctors' hands. Sometimes, however, he would grow weary of his enforced confinement and would say to his wife: "Dear, I wish we were back in our home on Long Island. It's sweet and green down there."

Thousands of letters and telegrams of sympathy were received at the hospital. It seemed as though the whole nation was watching by the wounded Mayor's bedside. One of these telegrams was from President Taft; others were from political allies and opponents, governors, ambassadors, etc. All contained earnest wishes for his restoration.

James J. Gallagher, the man who shot Mayor Gaynor and who was taken to the jail in Jersey City immediately after the attempted assassination, was formerly an employee in the New York City Dock Department. Two indictments will lie against him, one charging him with an attempt to kill Mayor Gaynor, and the other with a similar attack on William H. Edwards, Street Cleaning Commissioner, who while seizing Gallagher, received in his left arm one of the bullets intended for the Mayor. Gallagher is fifty-eight years old, and while in the dock department employ was known as a chronic complainer who was constantly writing letters to his superiors, making charges against certain individuals, or grumbling about what he regarded wrongs done to himself. He is said to have blamed the Mayor for not reinstating him in his position, as he had requested. He has denied that the attack was premeditated. When he read the announcement that Mr. Gaynor was about to sail for Europe on that day he instantly decided to commit the deed. It is presumed that the defense will offer a plea of insanity. There is little doubt that Gallagher was a "crank," but it remains to be seen whether the doctors and the jury will sustain the insanity plea.

Special prayers have been offered in many of the churches for Mayor Gaynor's restoration.

The Capture of Gallagher× Immediately After the Shooting

THE SLAUGHTER OF THE INNOCENTS

OFFICIAL figures given out concerning the infant mortality in New York City are appalling. They are sufficient to move the hearts of even the most indifferent. The Bureau of Municipal Research has issued a bulletin, which announces that, in the first week of June, twenty per cent. more infants under one year of age died, than in the same week last year, the figures being 225 in 1909, to 272 in 1910. The excess has increasingly persisted during every week since then. During the third week of July nearly 75 per cent. more children under one year of age died than during the same week of 1909 (399 in 1909 to 568 in 1910).

Physicians seem to be at a loss to account for this surprising increase. Temperature and humidity alone, they say, do not explain it, although July has been one of the hottest months in several years. In the opinion of some observers, the heat of late June and July was far more oppressive this year than last, whatever the official figures may be regarding temperature and humidity. This stifling and long-continued heat has undoubtedly had much to do with the increased infant death rate.

The New York Health Department insists that it is putting forth extraordinary efforts to check this frightful mortality. Three hundred nurses and physicians are on the city's pay roll. Each one of them is supposed to give from six to eight hours each day to the sick of the city. Babies are the chief patients.

A large part of this great mortality arises, the experts tell us, from a lack of proper nourishment and fresh air for the children. It is in order to help the children of Greater New York in these respects, that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD maintains its beautiful charity at Mont-Lawn, where every summer 3,000 children are entertained, under a corps of trained and intelligent caretakers. No death has ever occurred among them, although in sixteen years nearly 40,000 children of various ages have been sheltered there during the heat of summer. During the whole of these years of Mont-Lawn's existence there has hardly been even a serious accident.

But what is this single charity, when there are so many thousands to care for? It is like a drop in the bucket. There is work for scores of Mont-Lawns. The hillsides of the Hudson Valley, the mountains of Pennsylvania, the woodlands of New Jersey, the beaches of Long Island and the meadows of Connecticut, would need to be filled with tents and bungalows, in order to give to the poor children of Greater New York the summer fresh air that they ought to have.

The death-rate per 1,000 children under five years of age, during the decennium 1868-1877, was 23.4; it fell regularly during each subsequent decennium until in 1908 the rate was 11.8. In 1909, it reached the lowest figures on record, namely 10.0—a decrease of 66 from that of the first-mentioned decennium.

The principal factors to contend with in the fight to preserve infant life are the lack of a supply of pure milk; the density of the tenement population; and the high birth-rate among foreigners who are ignorant of our language. The chief work of the district nurses lies among this class. It is almost impossible to convince them of the necessity of proper and clean feeding, and of keeping their children clean. Yet New York in past years has held its own well in this matter as compared with other cities. Russian cities are the worst. When one considers the many elements which enter into the problem, one realizes that no section should be too heavily condemned without an examination of the causes which have contributed to its condition.

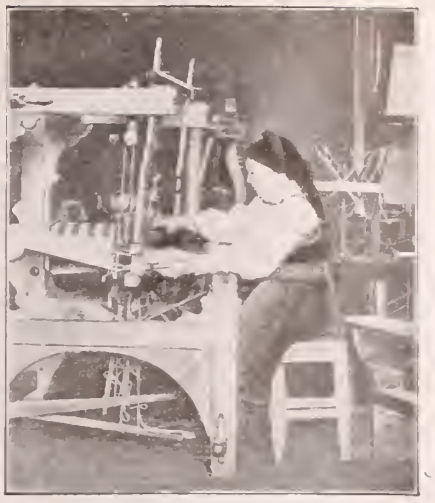
The ratio of deaths to births among children under one year of age in Moscow in 1909 reached the startling figure of 321 to 1,000; and in St. Petersburg of 282. In Montreal it is 257; in Dresden, 152; in Boston, 148; Glasgow, 137; New York, 128; Paris, 103; Amsterdam, 87; Sydney, Australia, 83. The German cities all had a higher rate than New York, and so did all the English cities, except London.

It is in the summer that the Angel of Death oftenest spreads his wings and breathes in the faces of the little ones. A prominent charity worker recently said, "We cannot make people understand that our poor suffer much more and die faster in summer than in winter." The awful heat of the tenements, the foul, stagnant air, and the spoiled food, especially the sour and impure milk, strike down young and old; but, most of all, the helpless babies. Yet our government has appropriated millions for the study and banishment of the boll weevil, in order to save our cotton; millions more to cure the diseases of horses and cattle; while our children, the nation's chief asset, the glory and hope of our country, have been allowed to die by the thousand with little thought by the government for their salvation.

KATE UPSON CLARK

IN THE LAND OF BUSY WOMEN

A Maid of Hardanger



At the Old-Fashioned Loom

Wholesome Exercise

The Housewife's Spinning-Wheel

THE life of a nation is in the breath of the children, therefore those who have the training of the children have the destiny of the nation in eir keeping. In all lands men are for the most rt busy in commercial pursuits, while woman's nction the world around is to bear and educate e young.

"What kind of women are here?" is the question should ask in every land we visit.

This question was asked by me in my recent visit Norway, and I diligently studied the subject by servation, by association, by conversation, and by ading.

Fair hair, blue eyes, and a brilliant complexion e characteristics of the Norwegian woman. She alert and sweet in her manner, and has a strength out her that makes one feel that she will be able all times to stand for herself. My first introduc- n to her was in the position of stewardess on the eamer.

The chief stewardess was a lady in appearance d manner. She wore a slightly trained dress, th dainty collar and cuffs. As she directed the her stewardesses, she seemed like a woman pre- ling over her own household. There was nothing ofessional about her manner, but the comfort of r tourist-guests was perfectly conserved.

My next contact with the women of Norway was the National Exposition in Bergen. Their beau- ful needle work, knitting and weaving helped to ake the exposition most attractive. The so-called Hardanger work" is a matter of national pride d every woman must have some of it on her ouse or apron or napery. A sort of etamine is the undation for rich hand embroidery. Consequently e tourist must pay high prices for it. The speci- ens of furniture, together with draperies and ngings, indicate that the homes are refined and steful. The lady attendants all through the ex- sition show how effective and practical the Nor- egian women are. The only objectionable posi- tion they occupied was that of barmaid in the beer halls. Their picturesque appearance there in black skirts, white waists and richly embroidered and beaded scarlet bodices (the national costume) only made the situation the sadder.

A cruise through the fjords, combined with drives in the valleys between the mountains, afforded opportunity to see the homes in farming districts as well as in villages and towns.

The industrious woman was everywhere. Sometimes she was to be seen walking along the road carrying a heavy basket strapped to her back, and busily knitting a stocking! She was at work in the garden with her husband; or, if a cottage was being built, she was helping. In towns where the homes were larger, the women were to be seen busily doing the housework, for the servant question enters very little into the domestic economy of Norway.

Queen Maud and Crown Prince Olaf

It must not, however, be understood from this that the women of Norway are mere household drudges. They think on large subjects. They must do so, for they are voters. For several years past they have had the right to vote on county questions; but the recent action of the Althing (Parliament) has given them the national vote. As yet there are no political organizations or clubs among women, and they are not given to making public addresses. I am told they have so much to do in their homes that they have not time for such things, but they read much about important matters.

Almost the only organization for women is the White Ribbon Association, or the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. It has a membership of between four and five hundred in all Norway, and represents earnest Christian womanhood working on all lines for the pure and sober living of men and women alike. The Norwegian W. C. T. U. is affiliated with the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and was represented at the recent World's Convention in Glasgow, Scotland.

The greatest lady of the land is Queen Maud. She is the daughter of the late King Edward VII. of England and of Queen Alexandra, who was a Danish princess. The King of Norway is of the royal house of Denmark. He was invited by the people of Norway less than three years ago to become their King. His title is King Haakon VII. The little Prince Olaf, heir apparent, is the darling of the Norwegian people. Queen Maud has truly queenly qualities, and she is proving herself a wise and good leader among the women of Norway.

AMONG THE WORKERS AT HOME AND ABROAD

—A TITLED BRITISH evangelist, the Rev. Sir harles Dunbar, is to visit us shortly on a eaching tour.

—EVANGELIST E. B. WESTHOFER, of Muncie, d., is conducting a successful revival at Max- ll, Ind., co-operating with Rev. W. E. Love- s, a pastor in that place.

—DR. G. CAMPBELL MORGAN, of London, has en the principal speaker at the Twenty- hth Annual Conference for Christian Work- at East Northfield, Mass. He conducted his ily course of Bible studies with nearly a ousand students.

—A PHILANTHROPIST who, it is said, has "de- ed to die poor" is David Ranken, a wealthy ristian citizen of St. Louis. He has given e bulk of his estate, estimated at $3,000,000, r philanthropic purposes, leaving for himself income of about $3,000 a year. One of his dowments is for a trades' school for poor ys.

—MRS. K. V. HILTON, of Charleston, S. C., is e founder and conductor of "The Band of ve Chapel," a work for children chiefly. ble study, sick visitation, charity work, dis- bution of religious literature, etc., constitute e leading features of this promising move- nt. Any hooks or good literature sent to rs. Hilton at 14 Sumter Street, Charleston, n be used to advantage.

—MLLE. VERE DE VEER, member of the French ciety of Peace and Justice, has been lectur- g to large audiences in the Eastern States on ace and Arbitration. She is the daughter of French army officer, and is a most effective d entertaining speaker. She may be ad- essed by churches, church societies, W. C. T. s. and similar organizations to No. 2 West venty-ninth Street, New York City.

—THE NORTHFIELD SUMMER SCHOOL for Sun- y School Workers, which closed lately, had 5 enrolled members, drawn from all the New ngland States, New York and New Jersey, with a scattering from other places. The Women's Home Missionary Conference has also closed a very successful session. The Women's Foreign Missionary Summer School of 350 delegates is now in full session.

—CAPTAIN GEORGE BENN, of the Gospel yacht Messenger, is actively engaged in his work among seamen who come into the port of New York. He goes from ship to ship in his little launch, supplying the men with good reading matter to break the monotony of the voyage, a monotony which has often driven men insane at sea. He also supplies them with small libraries of a few books each when these are obtainable. His work is evangelistic and he uses the opportunity as often as possible to drive home some Gospel truth, or encourage some man sick of a life of sin. All interested in aiding his worthy work may address him, Box 157, Brooklyn, N. Y.

—IN THE Moore Insulated Wire Works at Third and Race Streets, Philadelphia, a meal is served every day to the employees. In connection with the meal on Tuesday (and, during the winter, on Thursday of each week) there is held a short religious service consisting of singing, Scripture reading, brief address and prayer. The service is usually conducted by some representative from the Y. M. C. A., but at times other speakers are brought in—laymen who have an acquaintance with business life as well as with the teachings of the Gospel. These services have been proven through the experience of years to be very valuable. The meal served for ten cents consists of meat, or fish, potatoes, some vegetables, bread and butter, tea or coffee and dessert. Of course, each day the bill of fare is changed. These gatherings are largely due to the personal efforts of John W. Gottschalk, superintendent, and John W. Crombie, foreman.

—THE THIRD Interdenominational Conference of the Woman's Home Missionary Societies held at Northfield, July 14-21, was a brilliant success. The conference included words from workers direct from the field. Twenty-one missionaries were on the platform. Miss Lucy Laney (Presbyterian) told of school work among negroes in Atlanta, Ga.; Miss Florence Miller (Christian Church) and Miss Anna M. Larned (Congregationalist) presented the needs of the Southern Highlanders, followed by Miss Margaret Henry, herself a mountaineer. The needs of Spanish speaking people in our two newest States, New Mexico and Arizona, were outlined by Mrs. H. L. Hill and Mrs. Anna L. Kent (Methodist) and Mrs. Olin C. Gibson (Congregationalist). Missionary needs for the frontier were discussed by Miss Minna Frickey (Methodist). Mrs. Schucknecht (Presbyterian) set forth conditions in Alaska, "the national ice-box." Many aspects of the immigration problem were presented. The leaders for the Morning Bible hours were Rev. Dr. J. Monro Gibson; Rev. J. Stuart Holden, D.D., and W. R. Moody.

—MUCH HAS BEEN written about the union of the two great branches of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States—North and South—but as yet little progress has been made toward this much desired end. The churches will probably have to get their pointer in this direction from heathen countries, where they have little patience with denominationalism as such. In Korea, where these two branches of the church are established, they are even now demanding closer co-operation with ultimate union. Rev. George Heber Jones, D.D., for nearly twenty years has been a resident of Korea, and Rev. W. G. Cram has had charge of the work of the Methodist Church, South, in that country eight years. Dr. Jones is president of the Biblical Institute at Seoul and is now in America to launch a campaign for $250,000 to commemorate the silver jubilee of Korea. When the Commission of Federation between the two churches met recently in Cincinnati, these two men appeared before that body pleading for the practical union or federation of the work in Korea. The natives are insistent that the Theological Institute at Seoul shall be a joint school, and in this Jones and Cram are in hearty sympathy.

—WILFRED S. GRENFELL, the Labrador missionary-explorer and founder of the mission, writes from St. Anthony, Newfoundland: "I should not like to let pass such an important event to the Christian world as the loss of Dr. Louis Klopsch without expressing a word of gratitude for his life. Dr. Klopsch's wide philanthropies included the poor folk of this lonely shore. I have no doubt that from the equator to the pole messages of condolence have come in to yourselves and his family. Amongst them I should sincerely like mine to be included. Some time ago I asked through your paper for reading matter to be sent to this mission. The very wide response which this appeal received reminds me of the great breadth of Dr. Klopsch's influence."

—MISSIONARY CHRISTIAN SCHMITT, of Nain, Labrador, in a letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which has been over four months on the way, writes: "Some of the Eskimos have left their hunting of seal and walrus out at the ice's edge, thirty and forty miles away, in order to attend our services. Seals have been scarce and also walrus, so far. Many of our people have only the rock cod for food, which they secure with hook and line by making a hole through the six-foot-thick winter ice. We know that in two or three months our seemingly unconquerable winter, with all its ice and snow, will have to give way to the sun's power. Our Eskimos are great believers in Christ's resurrection and in their own. Can it surprise you, with this wonderful change in nature around them? Surely if it is wonderful what the sun can do, how much more can He do who is the Creator of it, the Sun of Righteousness, the Lord of the Resurrection!"

The Vatican's Backdown

FORTUNATELY for the people of Spain and for the peace of Europe, the trouble between King Alfonso's government and the Vatican has blown over, temporarily at least, by the abandonment of the proposed Catholic demonstration at San Sebastian. This backdown by the Vatican came none too soon, for it was known that large quantities of arms had been secretly conveyed into the country, and had the plan for an anti-government demonstration been carried out the peace of Europe might have been shocked by a "Red Sunday" like that in Russia several years ago. Premier Canalejas has made it clear to the Spanish people that the government's quarrel was not with religion but with clericalism, which sought to dominate the State and to nullify the decree of June 10 granting a legal status to Protestant churches and schools. Against this decree Rome rebelled, claiming that it violated the Concordat or treaty of 1851, and the Spanish Constitution. The Vatican refused to go on with the revision of the Concordat, which was then in progress, unless the obnoxious decree were rescinded, and unless certain laws, which it regarded as hostile to Catholic religious fraternities in Spain, were suspended. All this was in the nature of a Papal ultimatum, to which Premier Canalejas replied by withdrawing the Spanish representative at the Vatican. Rome's rejoinder was the withdrawal of the Papal nuncio at Madrid, which it followed by stirring up public sentiment against the government to the revolutionary point. When the crisis came King Alfonso was in England, but his minister was equal to the emergency and had a military force on hand at San Sebastian strong enough to crush any attempt at an armed rising. Canalejas' resolute course and the conviction that the sympathy of the people was mainly with the government, brought the clerical factionists to their senses, and halted the movement on the very threshold of war. This bloodless triumph will give the progressive element in Spain courage to go forward with the social, educational and industrial reforms on which King and Cabinet are in agreement, and which the country anxiously awaits.

The Truth About Franklin's Clothes

EVERY now and then when a laudable effort is made to dress our diplomatic corps in something more befitting their dignity on ceremonial occasions than the funereal spiketail or waiter costume in which they are now garbed, a cry is raised by some of our representatives in Congress that such a change is undesirable, and the old story of the way Franklin appeared at the court of Louis XVI. of France is brought out again for an airing, and it is urged that our diplomats should follow his example.

Franklin, it will be remembered, appeared among other foreign ambassadors and the uniformed generals and admirals at court in a plain suit, such as he was accustomed to travel in. The French, ever eager for novelty, hailed the innovation with momentary enthusiasm and supposed it was the costume of an ambassador from a poor and struggling nation.

As a matter of fact, Franklin had no intention of wearing the suit in which he appeared, and until he found out its effect, he probably had an uncomfortable time of it, for he was a man with an acute sense of the fitness of things. Some time before he had ordered a handsome court suit and expected to make as fine an appearance as any other foreign ambassador, but the tailor from whom he had ordered the suit did not get it finished in time and Franklin had to go in the only suit he had ready. He continued to wear it after his court suit was done, as he saw he had made an unintentional "hit." When he was in England, he wore a handsome court dress of velvet, embroidered with gold. In the early days of the Republic, in fact within the memory of many yet living, the diplomats had a prescribed uniform as well as the officers of the two fighting services. Our highest tribunal connected with peaceful settlements, the Supreme Court of the United States, also wear a dignified dress. Our diplomats naturally have not been able to make their peculiar situation understood. Foreign nations wondered at our lack of consideration for their customs and prejudices. The recent appearance of our envoys at King Edward's funeral in evening clothes, which we always connect with occasions of festivity, was an example. Some day we may be able to do these things differently and possibly a little better and more in harmony with the occasion than we do at present.

Triumphant Faith

IN the "crossing over" of Dr. Grattan Guinness, who passed away in England lately, the world loses one of its ablest men and Christianity one of the grandest of modern missionaries. He was a founder of missions and sent forth to the field probably more evangelists, pastors and teachers than any man of his day and generation. It is worth knowing how such a noble spirit met the last great change. In his final illness, during a brief respite from suffering, he said: "If I could preach for a thousand years it would be the same theme—Jesus, Jesus, Jesus. I am happy, and ready to go or stay." He dwelt much in those last hours on the world's progress in spiritual enlightenment, the history of redemption, the march of Christ's kingdom, the work of the Gospel in all the lands where he had labored, and they were not few. These high themes filled his soul, and the vision of the coming day when Christ would be universally lifted up and acknowledged by all the nations, was to him a very real one. Set-backs, losses, the plots of the enemy, he reckoned as mere incidents by the way. The Omnipotent was leading the Christian hosts and victory was assured. It was a splendid illustration of the triumphant faith of a Christian, who had frequently faced death on the field of duty and who would have accounted his own life as a very little thing for the sake of the dear Master he served.

The Gospel in the Canal Zone

ALTHOUGH it is less than five years since church work was begun in the Canal Zone under the authorization of the Isthmian Commission, it has made remarkable progress. There are now, according to the official figures furnished by the Canal Record, 39 churches in the Zone, viz.: Catholic 7, Episcopal 13, Methodist 3, Baptist 7, Adventist 1, Undenominational 8. Of these 39 church buildings, 26 are owned by the Canal Commission, and all but two are built on land owned by the United States government. Services in the undenominational churches are held by regular ministers or lay readers and the audiences in such churches represent practically all Christian sects and denominations. Besides this great aid rendered by the government to the dissemination of Christian teaching in the Zone, the Commission has 15 chaplains in its regular service. There are resident chaplains at the Ancon and Colon Hospitals and also visiting chaplains, so that due attention is given to the spiritual needs of the sick and dying. From the outset it has been the policy of the Commission to give every encouragement to church work, recognizing its importance in making for morality and good order throughout the Zone. It has granted land for church building, sold building material at cost, and otherwise assisted in establishing congregations. In a word, it has been a most efficient and valuable aid in improving the morals of Panama, and in fighting the vice and wickedness which prevailed there a few years ago, with the only weapon that can ever cope successfully with sin—the Gospel of Jesus Christ. And yet there are some cavillers who, even in the face of such a clear demonstration, will say that this is not a Christian nation.

Milk

THE question of supplying pure milk to great cities becomes yearly more perplexing. It was thought some years ago that the so-called "sterilization" of milk insured its purification and prolonged its usefulness. Later we have had it "modified" and "Pasteurized." Now we are told by the wise chemists, who are looking into the matter, that raw milk is, after all, the purest and best kind, if taken fresh and clean. A new foe to milk is singled out for abuse by the experts. He is called a "liquefier," and wherever he goes, decomposition and death follow. He forges his way into even the bubbling waters of the hillside spring, having his origin in decaying leaves and twigs. He cannot be entirely kept out of water, milk and many other liquids; and if he invades any fluid to an extent of more than ten per cent., he is dangerous to the health and life of those who imbibe it. He belongs to a species of bacteria, and, in common with his numerous relatives, especially enjoys milk. In a sample of Nathan Straus milk, supposed to be the purest which the charitable bureau supplies to New York City, 110,000 bacteria were found in a cubic centimeter. Twenty-nine per cent. of these were the highly objectionable "liquefiers." The Health Board of that city has advised all mothers to boil can or "pasteurized" milk before giving it to their children. Bottled milk of that brand, and two especially good kinds of raw milk, are considered safe; all other so-called "loose" milk (miscellaneous brands) should be boiled. Greater care on the farms regarding the cleanliness of animals, care-taking, stables and utensils; greater care on the boats and trains; and greater care in delivery are all needed, and laws to secure such care are on the way.

Minor Topics

—THE GERMAN Socialists now claim a total organized vote strength of 723,000.

—ANDREW LANG, a leading English critic, has declared in a recent essay that "the higher criticism is really bankrupt."

—JAMES WHITCOMB RILEY, "the Hoosier poet," has sustained a stroke of paralysis which affects his entire right side. He had been sick for weeks before the attack.

—ROBERT TREAT PAINE, the well known philanthropist and peace advocate, died in Waltham, Mass., August 11. He was great-grandson of the signer of the Declaration of Independence who bore the same name. Mr. Paine was interested in many charities and benevolences and had endowed several. He served in Congress from 1884 to 1886.

—MAYOR GAYNOR of New York has always been a warm friend of the children. He believes in plenty of playgrounds and healthy sports. Not long ago he wrote to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a letter strongly commending its Children's Home at Mont-Lawn. "The children are made happy there," he writes, "by the outing which the Home gives them. Nobody can think of the work of the late Dr. Klopsch in perfecting this praiseworthy enterprise without blessing him."

—FEW PEOPLE KNOW that one American woman, Mrs. Margaret W. Young, is President of the United States pro tem. many times in a year. She holds a unique position in the government employ which requires her to affix the signature of the President to important papers (land patents) that frequently represent great money value. She is authorized by Congress to do this and has done it now for three years. She signed "Theodore Roosevelt" to over 90,000 land patents, printing under that name her own, thus, "per Margaret W. Young." She has signed an even larger number with the name "W. H. Taft." Her handwriting is distinctly feminine.

—THERE SEEMS to be a wide difference of opinion among residents of Cleveland, O., regarding the results of the "Golden Rule" policy of the chief of police of that city. In a recent article from a correspondent, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD gave an outline of the policy in question and its methods of operation. We have received several letters on the subject, showing things from a different viewpoint. One gentleman, who has resided in Cleveland fifty years, states the unqualified opinion, based largely on daily reports of crime in the city newspapers, that "never in all that period has there been a greater prevalence of crime of all descriptions, and the police seemingly less able to cope with it, than during the operation of this so-called 'Golden Rule' policy." He adds: "In the light of Cleveland experience, however, it has yet to be demonstrated that the separate functions of protecting society from the depredations of criminals and of reforming the criminals themselves can be vested in one person—the ordinary policeman—without so overburdening that official as to seriously impair his efficiency as a guardian of the public peace."

PERSONAGES PROMINENT IN THE RECENT POLITICO-RELIGIOUS AGITATION IN SPAIN

Spain's Conflict with Vatican

THE conflict between the Holy See and the Spanish government became so acute that it seemed that a conflict would take place San Sebastian and other cities in Spain. The nger of the Roman clergy, voiced by Cardinal erry del Val, and expressed in letters and tele- ams sent out, was so bitter and defiant that there ere uprisings in several parts of the country, and herever there was any uneasiness on account of stility to the government, or strikes in the man- facturing centres, the situation became alarm- g. Premier Canalejas, recognizing the gravity of e situation, brought the strong hand of the gov- nment down upon the riotous elements, and espe- ally upon the representatives of the Roman Cath- ic Church, whom he considered responsible for the sturbances. It was understood that San Sebas- an would be the storm centre and that the Carlists, nder the mask of a religious movement, would en- ge in a bloody conflict which they even hoped ight shake the King from his throne and give the etender an opportunity to rule. The church au- orities seemed also to select that rebellious centre the scene of a fierce protest against the Spanish vernment. General Weyler was placed at the head the campaign against the riotous opponents of the vernment. Everything seemed ready for battle in an Sebastian, but the number, discipline and cour- e of the government troops produced quiet in the ty, and the bloody engagement was averted. Bet- r counsels prevailed in Rome also, and the monks, iests and friends of the church were asked not to sort to the use of arms. This was wise counsel, for thing could have been more disastrous to the cause the church or to the prospects for a settlement the future than to have been responsible for the edding of blood. Cardinal Merry del Val, the apal secretary, who has such influence with the ope, seems to be a bad adviser, a fomenter of ouble. He was largely responsible for the un- easant Fairbanks and Roosevelt episodes, and the presentatives of the Spanish government believe at it is his bitter and uncompromising spirit that as made most of the trouble in Spain. He is a paniard, but does not seem to know the New Spain, hich, like the rest of Europe, is friendly to liberty id opposed to the union of Church and State. The ate and the Church are both divine institutions, it history has shown that the domination of the ate by the Church is unfortunate for both Church id State.

Render therefore unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's, and to God the things that are God's. (Matt. 22: 21.)

w Without Eyes

Not long ago a marvelous operation was per- rmed on the eyes of a man forty years of age, who id been totally blind from birth, and he was made see perfectly. This case has been a source of eat interest and wonder among prominent physi- ans, for without the use of his eyes this man was le to do much of the work of one possessed of all s senses. He was a farmer and could do every- ing except hoe and plow. He caned chairs, picked tton, made fences, cut trees, and finally bought id paid for out of his own earnings a forty-acre ece of land. At one time he and his wife kept a untry store. With the untiring tuition of his ife he was able to discriminate by his sense of uch between any articles in his stock. His ability recognize colors astounded all doctors who knew of his case, for they cannot understand the phe- nomenon. He could instantly tell a red from a blue or a green from a yellow, merely by running his hand over the object. After the operation the doc- tors removed the bandage from his eyes, and hold- ing up an apple asked him what it was. He said he thought it must be an apple, for it was round and had red and green stripes. This proved his mental conception of colors to be correct. He was also a successful horse-trader, being able to tell unfailingly a light horse from a dark one, and ascertaining its age by the relative hardness of its eyeball. His sense of direction was wonderfully developed. He was an enthusiastic hunter, and would take his dogs and gun for all-night trips through dense woods alone. But no matter how dense the forest or how intricate the path he could always find his way home. When the blind man was led down the hos- pital corridor to the operating room different obsta- cles were placed in his path, but invariably he circled around them, never touching a thing on his way. It is not the material eyes that see after all, but the mind that sees through them. The mind beholds many things without the use of the visual organs. It discovers material facts, their relation to each other, the beauty that lies behind them, the Absolute Being who is behind all, and the forms and forces of the world. It is the heart that sees infinite love. The one who alone can purify the heart ex- pressed this great truth in his Sermon on the Mount:

Blessed are the pure in heart; for they shall see God. (Matt. 5:8.)

A Gigantic Warship

Because the British admiralty had taken such precautions to preserve secrecy in the construction of the Lion, the latest addition to the English navy, it was called the Mystery Ship. The Lion was launched at Devenport on Saturday, August 6. In point of displacement, speed, gun-power, armor pro- tection, and torpedo equipment, it is said to be superior to anything projected by foreign Powers. The length of the vessel is seven hundred feet, beam 88½ feet, displacement 26,000 tons. The engines are equal to 70,000 horse power. The cost of the ship is over $10,000,000. This cruiser is the first vessel to carry a number of 13.5 guns, eight of which are mounted in pairs on the central line of the ship. The guns are so ranged that they can be trained ahead, astern, or abeam. They can send a projec- tile weighing 1,250 pounds a distance of twenty miles. The armor of the Lion can resist a shell fired two miles away with a force equal to that required to lift 40,000 tons weight twelve inches from the ground. The speed of the Lion is thirty knots. It is to be hoped that God will sanctify these gigantic engines of war to the ushering in of a speedier and more lasting peace than the nations have ever known. Many think that the deadly modern instruments of war will have a tendency eventually to destroy war itself. It is certain that the spirit of love and universal peace is making rapid progress among the individuals and nations of the world. The armaments of to-day are only in imitation of the armies, navies and instruments of warfare used by the nations in all times.

And he shall set engines of war against thy walls. (Ezek. 26 : 9.)

Lockjaw Curable

About a month ago Walter Robinson, a boy four years old, living with his parents on Lafayette Avenue, Brooklyn, caught a finger of his right hand in a swinging gate and crushed it. Simple remedies were used, but the boy grew worse, and Dr. S. G. Munson, the family physician, was called, and dis- covered that the boy had tetanus. His jaws became locked, and his body was bent like a bow. He was taken to the Bushwick Hospital, where his case was pronounced hopeless. They administered, however, hypodermic injections of tetanus serum. In five days the lad could open his jaws, and he is now rapidly convalescing. A similar case was reported from Philadelphia the other day, and it looks now as though by the marvelous inventions of medical science this greatly dreaded and far too common disease may be mastered. The serum treatment is curing many of the heretofore incurable diseases. The soul's fatal diseases are all healed by the medi- cation of Christ's love, in the appropriation of Christ's life by faith.

Whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life. (John 6:54.)

The Largest Whale Ever Caught

Last winter in the Japan Sea was captured what is thought to be the greatest whale. It took three Japanese ships to convey the skeleton of this mon- ster to Moji. The whale was two hundred feet long. Its jawbones were twenty-five feet in length and the skeleton weighed fifty-five tons. Captain Carl Meier, with the steamship Oregonia, brought the skeleton of this whale from Moji, Japan, to the dock at Brooklyn. It was purchased in the Far East by a representative of the Museum of Natural History in New York City. The freight bill on the bones amounted to $5,000. Those who find physical diffi- culties in accepting the Bible story of the swallow- ing of Jonah on account of the smallness of the throat of the fish, might easily believe that such a whale as the one whose remains have been brought to New York would have no difficulty in swallowing one or even a dozen men. As we pass along the scale of life from the minute to the magnificent our thoughts ascend to the one Creator of all.

And God created great whales, and every living creature that moveth, which the waters brought forth abundantly, after their kind. (Gen. 1:21.)

Fatal Wedding Rice

As Mr. and Mrs. Asa Cummings of Binghamton, N. Y., started upon their honeymoon ten years ago, the wedding guests, according to custom, showered them with rice. Some of the rice entered the ear of the bride, a portion of which she was unable to get out for several days. A year after, she began to have slight headaches which she thought were the result of a cold, but as the pain continued she con- sulted a physician, and he found that one of the grains of rice had entered the ear so far that he could not extract it without an operation, and even with the surgery he did not get it out. Several operations followed during a number of years. Not very long ago Mrs. Cummings entered the Post- Graduate Hospital in New York for another opera- tion, and brain-fever, directly traceable to the kernel of rice in the ear, caused her death. There is often material and spiritual damage done unintentionally by carelessness and even innocent fun. What especial caution there should be to avoid harm to our fellow men! Their proper treatment is sug- gested by the instruction the king of Babylon gave with reference to Jeremiah:

Take him, and look well to him, and do him no harm. (Jer. 39 : 12.)

DON'T FORGET

IN speaking of a person's faults,
Pray don't forget your own;
Remember those in house of glass
Should seldom throw a stone.
If we have nothing else to do
But talk of those who sin,
'Tis better we commence at home,
And from that point begin.

Then let us all when we commence
To slander friend or foe,
Think of the harm one word may do
To those who little know.
Remember curses, something like
Our chickens, "roost at home";
Don't speak of others' faults until
We have none of our own.

GRANDFATHER'S WOLF

"WHEN we first moved into the Michigan big timber country," said grandfather, "we did not realize the danger from wolves, but there were really many there and it took several years to scare them entirely away.

"One day when I was about fifteen, another boy and I started out for a rabbit hunt. Suddenly, as we were passing a dense thicket, we heard a howling which literally made our hair stand on end. We knew that it proceeded from wolves, and presently we came where we could see them. There were two of them, the biggest we had ever seen.

"We set out to chase them, when suddenly we found that we were being surrounded by a whole pack of wolves—hungry, snarling fellows that frightened us nearly to death.

"Luckily there was a stout sapling nearby, and you never saw anything much nimbler than the way we climbed that tree. We had to drop our guns to do it—and there we were, treed.

"For hours we sat up in that tree, with the wolves skulking and growling beneath us. Then our parents became alarmed, and they, with some of the neighbors, sallied forth in search of us.

"They dispersed the wolves, killing two of them in the process, and wounding another.

"It was a bitter cold day, and we were so nearly frozen that we could hardly come down from the tree.

"One of our neighbors, who was a famous hunter, had the skin of the largest wolf stuffed and sent to the National Museum at Washington, where it is still on exhibition as the largest timber wolf ever killed in the 'big woods of Michigan.'"

Why He Wouldn't Hurry

THEY were riding to church and were late. Several of the party were worried and one remarked, "The audience will be waiting." "Well," observed the old pastor (who was to preach that forenoon), "don't let's fret over it, if we are a little late. It reminds me of the man who was being taken to execution. His guards were greatly exercised over the fact that they could not possibly get there on time. "Never mind," said the poor fellow, philosophically. "Don't fuss over it. The people can wait. There'll be nothing doing till I get there."

The Surprise of Goliath

THE preacher was graphically describing the encounter of David and Goliath to an audience of children. "He swung the sling around his head," said he dramatically, suiting the action to the word, "and whizz went the stone. It struck the giant full in the forehead. I can see Goliath clapping his big hand to his brow and saying: 'Well! Such a thing as this never entered my head before!' And then he reeled and sank to the earth—a dead giant." The applause was terrific—also the laughter.

Abdul Hamid's Wives

A Sun correspondent writes that Abdul Hamid's wives continue to be a source of perplexity to the Turkish government. Their number was estimated not to exceed 200, including female slaves of all ranks, but the Ministry of Finance found itself confronted by claims from 746 women who demanded from the ex-Sultan's successor compensation to the tune of $800,000. The government refused to pay this sum, but proposed that the Chamber should sanction an arrangement by which the women of the harem for a period of ten years should receive monthly pensions ranging from $4.25 to $21.25, which, even in frugal Turkey, is a pretty meagre subsistence. The Turkish Deputies, however, still thought the Ministry overgenerous. Finally a small majority was found for the government's project and so the women of the harem may look forward to receiving their little pension, at all events until 1920.

KLOSFIT Petticoats

"Klosfit" Petticoats fit. The little elastic jersey gusset set in over the hips and the elastic waist band take up the fulness and produce snug, trim lines, over which your skirt or suit will fit to perfection. The "Klosfit" gusset is a little thing that produces a big improvement, and there's not a penny added to the price of your petticoat for it! It costs no more than the "drawstring" kind.

1234. Klosfit Petticoat of durable Black Mercerized Cotton Taffeta, guaranteed for six months' wear or a new one free. Won't crack, tear or split. A prettily trimmed style with rows of shirring, tailor-strapping and an underneath ruffle for protection. $1.50 value..... $1.00

1235.—Klosfit Petticoat of splendid Silk-finished cotton Taffeta. Looks like silk, rustles like silk, almost as light as silk but wears like iron. Guaranteed to wear one year or a new one free. REST, baby, rest
Serene on mother's breast,
Nothing shall disturb or harm thee
With these loving arms around thee,
Rest, baby, rest.

Sleep, baby, sleep,
Sink into slumber deep,
Far away the bells are pealing,
Evening shadows o'er us stealing,
Sleep, baby, sleep.

Dream, baby, dream
Of earth and sky and stream,
Marvelous sights in Babyland
Are not for us to understand,
Dream, baby, dream.

Sleep, dream and rest,
Serene on mother's breast,
Far away the bells are pealing,
Evening shadows o'er us stealing,
Sleep, dream and rest.

GIVING UP THEIR IDOLS

I REMEMBER once going to a meeting, writes Rev. F. B. Meyer, at which they said they were going to have an exhibition of idols. I was always glad to see anything of a missionary sort, so I went to see those idols. I thought they would be the hideous idols of India or the South Seas. Six young men went to the rear to find them, and brought great sheets of cardboard. On one were dog whistles, and tobacco pouches, and pipes, and cigarettes, and cigarette holders; and on the other were ribbons, and feathers, and sham jewelry, and all the things that you women wear. As they brought these things in, a man behind me said: "That's my pipe"; and a woman said, "That's my feather." These simple people thought that, before we sent missionaries to the heathen, we ought to put away our own idols.

The "Young Mother" Helped

A PARAGRAPH appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of August 3, in which the Charity Organization Society of New York City appealed for aid for a struggling young mother left with several children to fight a hard battle against poverty. The following contributions were sent to the treasurer of the society, by readers of this journal, in response to the appeal:

M. M. R., New Market, Md., $3; W. W. D., Norristown, Pa., $5; Mrs. J. B., Newark, N. J., $2; a Friend, Brooklyn, N. Y., $1; J. M. K., Newberry, S. C., 50 cents; J. P. M., Wilmot Flat; N. H., $2; E. B. M., Newark, N. J., $1; F. A. H., Prince Bay, N. Y., $1; R. E. O., Ocean Grove, N. J., $1; I. A. R., Piermont, N. H., $1; Cash, Connecticut, $2; a Christian Woman, 25 cents; a Friend, $1; C. E. B., 75 cents; R. C., Milo, Me., $10; H. B. H., Chicopee Falls, Mass., $1; Mrs. W. J., Braddock, Pa., 50 cents; J. L., Ocean City, N. J., $2; M. W. M., Harlem, Mont., $2; N. P., Marysville, $1; Mrs. B. S., Geneseo, Kan., $1; a Friend, Nashua, N. H., $1; His Servant, Westville, N. Y., $3; In His Name, Newark, N. J., $10; I. C., Syracuse, N. Y., $2; Mrs. J. R. H., New Brunswick, N. J., $2; P. N. K., Rheems, Pa., $2; Mrs. L. R. P., Utica, N. Y., $2; I. G. P., N. Y. City, $5; A. R., Elm Creek, Neb., $1; H. C., Sayville, L. I., $5.

This little fund, we are assured, will be used to keep the family together during the coming months, and the generosity of our readers is greatly appreciated.

General Notes

—MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS is paying a visit to Iceland. She writes from Reykjavik that she is meeting with fair encouragement in her effort to start a "CHRISTIAN HERALD Sunday School movement" there.

—THE NET RESULT of the recent brutal lynching of Carl Etherington by a mob in Newark, O., has been the removal of the sheriff, who failed to preserve order and protect the prisoner from the lynchers, and the payment by Licking County of a substantial sum to the heirs of Etherington.

—STATISTICIAN CLARENCE J. BLANCHARD of the United States Reclamation Service is quoted as authority for the statement that 15,000 American farmers who settled in Canada have returned within the last nine months. This statement has excited much controversy and is disputed by the Canadian officials, who claim that it is inspired by American Western land speculators.

—APROPOS OF OUR COMMENTS in last week's issue concerning the exclusion of the Bible from the public schools in Illinois, a reader in Bridgeport, Pa., sends us this highly instructive letter:

Enclosed is a newspaper clipping from the Norristown, Pa., Times of July 13 in reference to re-establishing the reading of the Bible in the public schools here. The reading of the Bible was forbidden in the schools by order of the Board of Education last September. Some time thereafter I noticed an article in reference thereto in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Bridgeport is a borough with a population of about 4,000, of which over half are Catholics. It had been the custom for the teachers of the public schools of Bridgeport to read a portion of the Scriptures every morning at the opening of the sessions, and also to repeat the Lord's Prayer in concert. A Catholic child was disciplined by a Protestant teacher for not repeating the Lord's Prayer properly. The Board of Education was composed of three Catholics and three Protestants. At a meeting of the board two of the Protestant members were absent, and the Catholics, being in the majority, voted to discontinue the reading of the Bible and the repeating of the Lord's Prayer. At subsequent meetings of the Board, the two religious factions refused to work in harmony. The matter was finally taken into court and the entire board ousted and a temporary one appointed. A new board was elected and entered upon its duties in June, and on July 13 passed a resolution re-establishing the reading of the Bible in the public schools, but the Lord's Prayer is not to be repeated. The present board is composed of three Catholics and three Protestants. Three members of the board that was ousted were re-elected and are serving on the present board.

A CENTURY OF SUNDAY SCHOOLS

By Rev. Ezra T. Sanford, D.D.

IT was an interesting programme to Sunday School workers which was arranged by the committee of the Baptist Ministers' Conference to commemorate the hundredth anniversary of the organization of the first Sunday School in New York City. It included an open air service at the corner of Eldridge and Division Streets, near Chatham Square, on July 10 at 4 P.M. Adjoining this corner Joseph Waldo Griffiths, a member of the Mulberry Street Baptist Church, and Charles G. Sommers, on the second Lord's Day in July, 1810, began the first Sunday School in the metropolis, and introduced for Sunday School work the idea of volunteer teachers, Bible study and Christian hymns.

The three young men received their inspirations to engage in this work through the instruction of their pastor, Rev. Archibald Maclay, who had become familiar with the successful schools of Robert Raikes and William Fox since 1785 in England, where poor children were instructed by paid teachers on the Lord's Day in the rudiments of an education such as other children gained week days in private schools.

The room at 88 Division Street was hired by Mr. Griffiths, who afterward became a pastor and for many years served the church now located at Nanuet, in Rockland County, New York, where he organized the first Sunday School in the county. Watts' hymn-books and Bibles were purchased, and in a few weeks the school numbered 142 pupils.

Charles G. Sommers, who assisted in organizing the first Sunday School in New York City, also became a minister, and it is proposed to erect a tablet to his memory on September 25, 1910, at the Collegiate Church, where a rally of Sunday School officers and teachers will be held; for it was in the parish of this church that he served as pastor, and at his death a legacy by him for the benefit of the poor perpetuates in this field his Christian ministry.

On the evening of September 26 a rally of the Sunday School scholars of Greater New York City is planned for a special service, for which Rev. R. F. Y. Pierce is preparing a programme of songs and addresses.

At this service there will be the unveiling of a tablet commemorating the efforts of J. W. Griffiths, who, under the instruction of Pastor Archibald Maclay in his Bible class in this parish, took the initiative to establish what has now become the modern Bible Sunday School, with volunteer teachers, Bible study and Christian songs.

We are able to see the likeness of these men by the pictures in this article. The water color portrait of J. W. Griffiths is by Mattie Schlier, of 244 Sixth Avenue, from a very old print furnished by his family. The picture of Charles G. Sommers is taken from a steel engraving in Fowler's Pulpit Eloquence, published in 1856, in which the following statement occurs: "Mr. Sommers has been an active upholder of Sabbath Schools. He and Mr. (now Rev.) Joseph Griffiths commenced the first Sunday School in America upon the plan of Robert Raikes in July, 1810, in Division Street. This is a fact not only interesting in itself, but a pleasing evidence of the pioneer spirit of the man—his readiness to work when work was to be done and to originate work when it was needed."

It is interesting also to note of this young man, who was born in London in 1793, of Norwegian parents, that when he came to America, but a boy, he found employment with John Jacob Astor. He refused to work for hi Sunday. This refusal met a from Mr. Astor: "I'm glad we've one Christian among us; so, Ch you go to church to-morrow and for us; and the rest of us will down and get off the schooner."

The picture of Dr. Arch Maclay is from a woodcut in Cath Encyclopedia and represents a great minister of Christ, who was in Scotland in 1778 and died in York, May 20, 1860. He orga the Mulberry Street Baptist C in 1809, and served the parish occupied by the Second Avenue Ba Church till 1837, when he became of the American and Foreign Society.

Of Rev. Joseph W. Griffiths we also state that he was born in Britain, December 3, 1781, and di Nyack, N. Y., October 24, 1860. initiative and sacrifice have led a great work in the Church of C In 1810 or 1811, according to Jo Power, Mary W. Morgan, afterw Mrs. Mason, a Methodist, start school in Chatham Street, and in in June, Mrs. Isabella Graham, died July 27, 1814, a little ov month after its organization, sta the first Sunday School in the G wich Village section of New York visit made by the wife of Dr. Sh of Boston, to New York City in led to the first Sunday School on improved plan in Boston.

The Sunday Schools of the city well give honor to whom honor is by placing tablets in these chur about which cluster the sentiment the pioneers in this great volun work for the cause of Christ. Brower Darst, of New York City, designed the tablets for this cen nial occasion, and it is hoped that milestone in the religious history of city will be inspiring to the teache do better work for the Master in centuries to come.

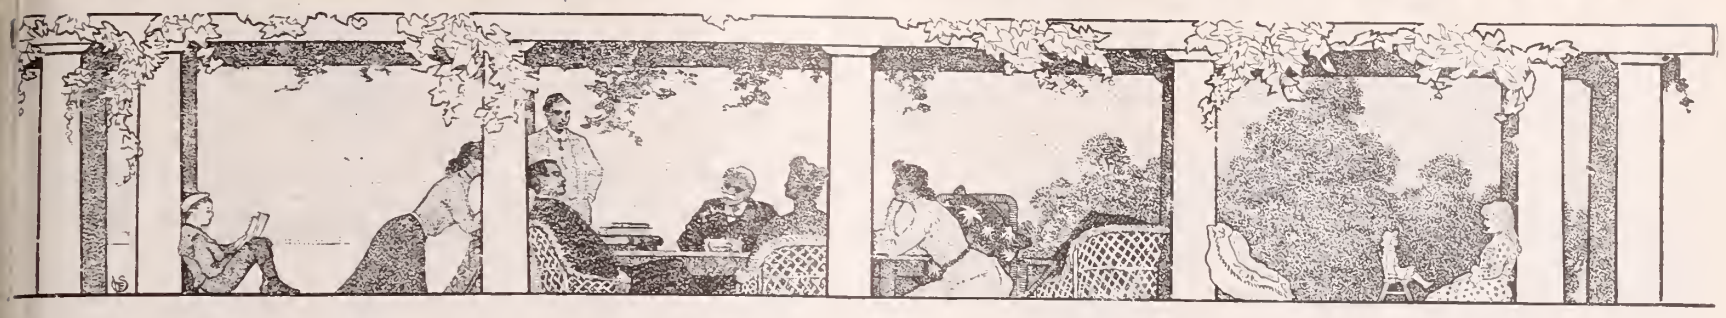
MAKING THE HOME HAPPIER



Women in Council

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE topic recently proposed for discussion, "How to teach children to be truthful," brings out, as was to be expected, contrasting views from parents in general. Here is a letter which gives a bit of household history:

The Child and Her Flowers "I have my bit to contribute for the help of mothers who have the care of imaginative children. My little Emily, six years old, came in one day, flushed and excited, and coming up to my chair exclaimed, 'O mother! I have had such a nice time. I went way, way up the road and I stopped at Aunt Katie's, and when I came away she gave me a big bunch of flowers. Then I walked along a little further and stopped to see Louise, and she gave me another bunch of flowers. When I was almost home Mrs. Lee called me and said, 'Come here, Emily; I have a basket of flowers for you.' By the time I got back I had more flowers than I could carry, and they kept dropping all the way, so that I walked over roses and lilies.' I saw that the child had not a single flower in her hands. After a minute I said, 'Emily dear, this is a beautiful story, but where are the flowers? Have you left them in the hall? Go and bring them to me, and I will help you put them in our vases.' A blank look succeeded the child's elimation and presently tears filled her eyes. She began to cry. 'O Mother,' she said, 'it isn't a really true story. I just thought each place I went to how lovely it would be if I could have a heap of flowers, and then I thought and thought and when I came in here I felt as if I had them, and now they are all gone. I never did have them; I only thought I had.'

"I tried to make her understand the difference between fancying and possessing, and I think I succeeded. Emily is now fifteen and no one can be more exact, more really truthful than she is in every word and thought. L. T. S."

My Way of Doing "I am an old-fashioned mother, and I have brought up five boys and one girl with considerable success. I do not understand your hair-splitting as to what is true and what is false. Black is black and white is white. I bring my children up to look at things as they are. If a child of mine ever told a falsehood I punished him at once. My little girl who is the youngest was never whipped, except for telling a story. I am not reflecting on anybody else, but if you have a lot of work to do and a number of children to bring up you haven't time to sit down and reason out the why of the things they say. You have got to look at things literally, or let them alone. As for grown people not telling the truth, that strikes me as nonsense. My husband and I are quite agreed that there is never any occasion to prevaricate. Our no is no, and our yes the same. MRS. J. R. Y."

Be Truthful Yourselves "Dear Mothers in Council, will you let a grandmother give you a word of advice? Never promise child anything and disappoint him. Never say that you are going on a visit to-morrow and will take the children, or that they may have a picnic on Saturday afternoon, and then break the engagement with them with the excuse that you have changed your mind. Keep your word, although it may inconvenience you if you have once given it. Be very careful how you threaten children. If you do unfortunately utter a threat it is usually best to carry it out. Believe what the children tell you. Never let your children think that there is a lie in the world. My sons and daughters are married and bringing up their own brood in these days. I tell them to accept what the children say as if it were Gospel truth, just as I did with them. Truth is a matter of atmosphere much more than of training. I know, for I have lived long enough to be pretty sure where I stand in a thing of this kind.

The Habit of Putting Off The habit of deferring until to-morrow what should be done to-day is so insidious that it should be resisted with might and main. In the day of a somewhat misty past a young girl asked a friend to write in her autograph album. The album was a priceless treasure. Its possessor was gradually filling it with bits of verse and agreeable sentiments in prose contributed by her school friends, her pastor, teachers and the nice people whom she met as guests in her own house or whom she visited on occasion. What was her dismay to wait several months for the return of her album, and her embarrassment when finally she screwed her courage up to the point of expressing a wish for its return. It came to her with a single line written in dainty feminine characters, with quotation marks, "Procrastination is the thief of time." The delinquent contributor intended this as her explanation and apology. The conclusion is obvious that it was adequate as neither. Whatever one ought to do, be it smaller or greater, one ought to do quickly. Delays are dangerous. Particularly if one have a disagreeable thing to do, let it not be postponed. Whether it be going to the dentist or asking pardon for an offense or beginning a bit of work that one dreads, such as cleaning the cellar or setting in order an untidy store-room, there is nothing gained by putting it off. If it is well to do anything, it is well to do it quickly. People who are always mortgaging to-morrow never accomplish anything worth while to-day.

The Jericho Road That old road from Jerusalem to Jericho was notorious for its danger and difficulty. It happened to be a down-hill road, and the folk who fared upon it were in greater danger of being beset by thieves, we fancy, when they had set their faces toward Jericho than when they were going to Jerusalem. Going upward to the holy city, as they would reach the higher levels they would come out into the open, and there would be fewer lurking places for the robber and assassin. Somehow when we think about that Jericho road it comes over us that there are still wayfarers going down hill and sorely in need of help; men who have left Jerusalem behind them, and on the path to Jericho have fallen among thieves. They have been robbed of hope and of courage, they have lost their grip, temptations have overmastered them, and very likely they are lying wounded and half dead, with empty purses and white faces, under the burning sun or the midnight chill. The priest and the Levite, the well-to-do church-going public, the fortunate people who have nothing to worry them and who have never been tempted, pass them by. Well for them if some one appears who has a loving heart and a warm hand, who tarries, pities and lifts them up, carries them to an inn, where they may be sheltered, and never leaves them until they are again strong and well and may start on their journey, this time up hill and not down. Whoever has the Christ spirit will stop to render aid and comfort to the fallen pilgrim on the Jericho road.

A Mother's Bequest "A while after my mother's death, I was looking over a small box of articles that she had cared for, and found among them this clipping tied up carefully, as something she felt choice of. I had never seen it before, and there is no date or name of writer. Many years have passed since, but I never go to my own rest without seeming to hear her voice speaking in the words of these verses. J. F."

Not on a prayerless bed, not on a prayerless bed,
Compose thy weary limbs to rest;
For they alone are blessed
With balmy sleep
Whom angels keep:
Nor, though by care oppressed,
Or anxious sorrow,
Or thought in many a coil perplexed
For coming morrow,
Lay not thy head
On prayerless bed.

For who can tell, when steep thine eyes shall close,
That earthly cares and woes
To thee may e'er return?
Arouse, my soul,
Slumber control,
And let thy lamp burn brightly;
So shalt thine eyes discern
Things pure and sightly;
Taught by the Spirit, learn
Never on thoughtless bed
To lay thine unblessed head.

August Sunshine An artist who fondly loved nature and was accustomed to study her in every phase and aspect and every changeful mood, once said that cloud scenery of August and the August sunshine surpassed in beauty the effects of every other month. Whoever in August drives through a mountain land or strolls along the seashore must pay tribute to the magnificence of the sunsets. The crimson gold and opal, the sapphire and the rose, the amber light, the after-glow, when the close of day deepens into the twilight, are so exquisite that no painter can hope to catch more than a reflection of their glory. In the afternoon, when the sun lies on the velvet slopes of the hills, when the wind passing over a field of buckwheat in bloom causes it to ripple till the snowy flowers toss like miniature waves, when every fence rail is wreathed with briar and vine, when the first flags of autumn are seen in the golden-rod, the purple aster, the year has reached its coronation.

It is for the country housewife the busiest time of the whole twelve months. If she has opened her doors to summer guests she is compelled to spend much of her time in the kitchen preparing the three meals a day to which they bring such excellent appetites. She is busy, too, in putting up fruits for next winter's consumption, and in transplanting or potting flowers that she hopes to have for indoor pleasure when summer is over and days are chill.

THE SINGING LESSON

Let the notes be full and clear
Singing should be hearty;
This advice it would appear
Suits our little party.

Never sing with voices loud
When you're singing in a crowd.
Always let your voices blend
Sweet and thrilling to the end.

The Turning-Point

By BELLE GRAY

CLOSING the door, she crossed the room and dropped into a chair that was placed beneath the one window. Another morning spent in tramping the streets, and still no work! On every hand her inquiries had met with the same answer:

"Sorry, but we've nothing for you. If you'll come later, when the holiday rush is on, we'll see what we can do. But we've no call for salesladies at this season."

And yet, at this season one had to live; and to live in the great, clamorous city meant money, money, money. A sardonic smile twisted the girl's lips as she opened her rusty handbag and drew out a slim purse. She snapped back the catch and shook the contents into her lap—a few pieces of small silver. There was no more, and her board was long overdue. She shrank from meeting the kind but anxious landlady; for she knew that her first words would be:

"Had any luck to-day?"

"Did God care?" she asked herself. Only a short year ago, when her parents were alive, she had believed in his sheltering love; but now—oh, she had tried so hard, so hard! She was not a shirker. She had tried with all her might; and yet to have to listen to those knell-like words again and again:

"Sorry, but we have nothing for you."

There was one way out. If the worst came to the worst—and it looked to-day as if the worst had already come—there was yet one means of escape. It meant a downward step—should she take it?

She thought of a letter which was in her pocket, a letter which had at first shocked every fibre of her being. Now it did not seem so terrible.

"Nobody cares for you," she said, speaking to her image in the mirror, "so why should you care for yours? Yes, he's right about it; you'll have to give up. Everything's been against you. You've had no chance. And nobody cares."

A bitter recklessness, strangely at variance with her youthful face and girlish figure, drew up her soft chin and stiffened her drooping shoulders. With quick, decisive steps, she made her way to the washstand, where she bathed her burning eyes and fevered cheeks and dried them on the coarse towel. Then, after smoothing her hair, she nerved herself to go down to the dining-room.

It was a glorious day; one of those days which winter has stolen from more opulent younger sister, and which, for want of a better name, we call Indian summer. Even in the dusty city, the air was bracing and full of tonic freshness, but the interior of the cheap boarding house was redolent with the scents of yesterday's cabbage and to-day's turnips and onions. Hot waves of odor assailed the girl's nostrils as she descended the narrow stair.

"Her hands trembled as she took out the trinkets"

"I'll not have to stand this long," she told herself defiantly as she pushed open the dining-room door.

She was glad to find the room deserted; but her lip curled with disgust when she regarded the dirty dishes and smeared cloths that the boarders had left behind them.

"You're late," grinned the waitress as she tripped over and began to stack the heavy dishes on a large tray. "Well you know how it is here. First come first served. Too bad Mr. Burton spilled coffee at your place."

"It doesn't matter," returned the girl. "Nothing matters now," she added mentally.

"Catch on to who's a-coming," whispered the waitress as she tossed her head toward the open door.

The Turning-Point

The girl raised her eyes and saw advancing a shabby little man and an equally shabby, but sweet-faced, little woman who led by the hand a sturdy boy of four or five. That they were newcomers was evident from the shy glances which they cast about them as they hesitated at the door.

"This way, sir," directed the waitress, motioning to the table where the girl sat. She favored the girl with a sly wink when the trio seated themselves opposite. "Hay-seeds," she confided sotto voce as she clattered out with her tray of dishes.

The shabby couple sat in embarrassed silence while the waitress returned and supplied them with clean plates, knives and forks, as well as limp, dejected-looking napkins. When she bustled away again, the child sat up straight in his chair and favored the girl with an ingratiating smile. He was an attractive little fellow, with round red cheeks and wide-awake blue eyes, but the girl did not meet his advances, and, deciding that smiles were thrown away upon this reserved young lady, the boy shifted his interest to the dishes of steaming food which the waitress was now arranging in wonderful semicircles around the plates. It was when that brisk young woman had finished her task and rushed back to the kitchen that the little chap addressed his father:

"Daddy, kin I ask the blessin'?" he shrilled.

The father cleared his throat. "You see, Miss," he explained to the girl, "we're used to being in our own little home, where we always have the blessing. I hope you'll excuse us if we have it here."

With a sullen jerk, the girl inclined her head, and the father and mother bowed theirs reverently as the child folded his chubby fingers.

"Dear God, thank you for everything. Amen," he piped in his high treble.

When the grown persons had raised their faces, the mother stroked the boy's hair and adjusted his red silk tie.

"Jamsie don't ask the blessing like other folks," she informed the girl. "He has his own way o' saying it—says something diff'runt every time. And I do think," she continued, "that he's pretty near right about it. We ought to thank Him for everything, oughtn't we, Miss?"

The girl's bitterness welled up into her young eyes, and roughened the tones of her young voice. "Some of us can't see much to be thankful for," she muttered.

"Maybe that's because we don't look at things right," suggested the little woman. "Now Jim and me's seen a heap o' trouble since we left the farm. He had a good place when we come here, but he lost it, and we had sickness, too. We hated to leave the little house we'd rented, but it's cheaper to board—and then we had to sell all our furniture, anyway, to pay the doctor bills. But Jim's got another job now, and maybe we can save up enough to go to housekeeping again. And when I think o' how much worse it might a-been, I feel grateful, I can tell you."

The girl pushed back her untasted food. "You've got a more grateful disposition than I have," she sneered.

A hurt look passed over the little woman's face, but did not mar its sweetness. "I know I hadn't ought to be talking so much 'bout my own affairs," she apologized, "but, you see, down in the country where I used to live, me and my neighbors was jest like one fam'ly; and I got in the habit o' telling them everything, somehow."

"I was raised in the country myself. I—I lived there before—before I lost my parents." The girl had struggled to her feet and now gazed down at the little family group with working features. "I love the country," she choked. "Oh, how I wish I'd never left it," and with these words she wheeled and almost ran from the room.

The woman jumped up as if to follow her, but the husband laid a restraining hand on her arm.

"She's in trouble, Jim," insisted the wife.

But the husband shook his head. "You let her be, Jessy," he advised. "Let her cry it out by herself. After a while, maybe, we can help. But she's got to work it out by herself now."

With desperate swiftness the girl had sped up the steps and into her room. She locked the door; then flung herself face-downward upon the bed.

"Oh, mother, mother!" she groaned as her mind went back to the little country home where she had spent a joyous childhood. A Christian home, a loving father and mother, she had lost all this; but—had she been grateful for the treasure when she possessed it? Had she ever returned thanks for anything? To be sure, she had said her prayers in those days, but the spoken formula had been the mere lip-service of a careless, happy nature. Was she being punished for her ingratitude? If so, her punishment was severe indeed, for nothing was left to her now; and her Christian mother, if she could look down on her unhappy child, must be tasting grief that even the bliss of heaven could not assuage.

At thought of the mother by whose knee she had lisped her childish petitions, a sick horror shook the girl from head to foot. Was it possible that the mother had been reading her little girl's heart? Could it be that she knew the plans her child had been making?

With a sudden movement, the girl sprang from the bed and hurried over to her trunk. Her hands trembled with eagerness as she took out the trinkets that had come to her from a source that meant ultimate ruin—trinkets of temptation—jewelry that she had been ashamed to wear in public—costly trifles that she had longed to pawn in order to obtain necessities, and yet which some instinct had urged her to keep.

In feverish haste, she made a bundle of the jewels, together with a few crumpled letters. Tying them up in a bit of brown paper, she took a pencil in her nervous fingers and scribbled an address upon the package. It would take almost her last cent to pay the messenger who would carry it, but even so, it must be done. She threw up her head with a certain free grace.

"Whatever happens, I'll keep straight, mother," she cried exultantly, her voice half a prayer.

But as she spoke, a full realization of the ruin she had been facing swept over her in a flood of hot shame. And her gratitude to the Power who had saved her from a fate worse than death, found vent in a gush of healing tears, while she slipped to her knees and sobbed out the little boy's words:

"Dear God, thank you for everything."

JESUS AS SAVIOUR

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

JESUS told in a parable about a man who at first refused to do his duty. The man knew it was his duty to go and work in the vineyard, because his father told him to do it; but he answered his father in a most unfilial manner: "I will not." Possibly the father looked grieved and went away, and then the son come to himself, and went to work in the vineyard.

In a parable, Jesus told about a man who would not do his duty. His father said to him, "Go work in the vineyard." It was the same father and the second man was brother to the first. He answered, "I go, sir"; but he did not go. It is probable that he never had any intention of going, so he was not only a shirker, but a liar. If we had to choose between these two men, we would take the first; and yet there is not much to choose between them. The first did his duty so grudgingly it was almost the same as not doing it at all.

"Everybody loves a cheerful doer; so does God." If you should ask which son loved the father most, we should answer, neither. The test of love is obedience; it is the touchstone. It sweeps away a whole mass of natural feeling and shows what is true and what is false. Sometimes, when our hearts are tender, we say to our heavenly Father, "Thou knowest that I love thee." What does he answer? "Go and show it." Like which son have we acted?

The Pharisees and Duty

The Pharisees did not do their duty and yet they were the most punctilious of men. They seemed always to be doing their duty, praying, fasting, watching ceremonially and giving alms, etc.; nevertheless they were not in the line of duty; if they had been Jesus would not have called them "hypocrites." They did what they chose to do, and not what God wanted them to do. They chose sacrifice rather than obedience. It is true God wanted them to pray, and to give alms, but he did not want them to do these things in the spirit of vainglory. They glorified themselves and not their heavenly Father. They would not obey the voice from heaven, which said: "This is my beloved Son; hear ye him." But on every possible occasion they found fault with the words and deeds of that Son and tried to teach others to dishonor him.

The Pharisees came to Jesus one day, asking, "By what authority doest thou these things?" For Jesus had been teaching in the temple, and healing the sick, and casting out the traders. Jesus answered them by asking a question: "The baptism of John, was it from heaven, or of men?" They knew that John had baptized many, perhaps hundreds of people, and they did not dare to say that John's baptism was of man, and therefore good for naught. And although they knew that there had been wonderful signs when John had baptized Jesus, they would not acknowledge that John's baptism was from heaven, so they answered Jesus: "We do not know." What a convenient lie to hide behind! But Jesus, who could read what was in the mind and heart of man, knew that they knew, and he proceeded with them on that ground; then it was he spoke to them the parable of the two sons, which was as a mirror held before them. In the son who first refused to obey his father, and then repented and obeyed, Jesus would have the Pharisees see not themselves, but publicans and other sinful ones. In the second son, the Pharisees could have seen themselves if they only would—as one who pretended doing his duty. But the Pha would not thus see themselves, Jesus needed to drive them al harder, so he spake another pa with imagery that would burn de A vineyard planted and furnished winepress and watchtower: God's ple Israel hedged about with his and providence, the winepress o ing service given to them, while were constantly shielded by his c care from their enemies. But whe Master of the vineyard would ha fruits, and sent a servant for he was not only refused, but his vant was beaten; a second servan sent, and he was killed; a third sent, and he was stoned; then Master sent his Son, and they him rather than give the Maste due.

If the Pharisees had looked i mirror, they would have seen selves as those guilty of stoning killing the prophets, and already had killed Jesus in their hearts. But they would not thus see themse they followed their usual custo passing judgment upon others, condemned the workers in the yard.

There are none so blind as thos will not see! And still more, needed to call upon the stones o temple to testify of him befor Pharisees would acknowledge tha were the men he was reproving.

In the building of the temp stones were brought ready to be into place without the sound o hammer, but there was one whic around, unidentified, seemingly u until the building was about to be pleted, when it was discovered the chief, the headstone of the co and when it was placed in positio cry went forth, "Grace unto it.' recalled what the prophet had about that stone, but still they di they would not see him in that until he sent it crashing about h the words: "He that falleth o stone shall be broken to pieces; b whomsoever it shall fall, it will s him as dust."

Duty has been likened to an that walks beside us with s steps; common life has been com with a path which shines more more as the will of God is done there is a mist through which we pass to be nearer to God; the world feels like a temple to worsh and the future world is as the h holies into which we shall pass a

Many people spend much tim thought in trying to find out their duty is. Dr. Russell C describes such people in a story he tells as having been given t by an Arabian guide. There liv on the banks of the Indus an a Persian by the name of El H From his beautiful and comfo cottage on the hillside he could down upon a gleaming river, an over the glorious sea. He was a whose field and orchards yielded p tifully and he had money at interes beautiful wife and lovely chi shared with him the joy of a h home. One day there came t cottage a Persian priest. That sat down with El Hafed befor blazing fire on the hearth and to how diamonds were made. "I had a diamond," said the old "as big as your thumb, you coul chase many farms like this, and had a bushel of them you coul the whole country."

That moment El Hafed became All of his possessions seemed t their value, as the feeling of d tentment filled his soul. He sa must have a mine of diamonds. is the use of spending one's life way in this narrow sphere? I mine and shall have it!" That night he could not sleep. Early the next morning he went to the priest, and asked where he could find those diamonds.

"If you want diamonds," said the priest, "go and get them."

"Won't you please tell me where I can find them?" said El Hafed.

"Well, if you go and find high mountains, with a deep river running between them, over white sand, in this white sand you will find diamonds."

The enthusiastic, restless and dissatisfied farmer sold his farm, took the money and went off in search of diamonds. One day, broken-hearted and in rags, a hungry pauper, stung with humiliation, and crushed by his bitter disappointment, he stood on the shore of the Bay of Barcelona. He looked at the big waves as they came rolling in, and in a moment of despair he threw himself in and sank, never to rise again.

The man who had purchased El Hafed's farm led his camel out one day to the stream in the garden to drink. While the camel buried its nose in the water, the man noticed a white flash of glittering, glistening, sparkling something at his feet. Out of curiosity he reached down and picked up a black stone with a strange eye of light in it, which seemed to reflect all of the colors of the rainbow. He took the curiosity to the house, and laid it on the mantel, and soon forgot all about it.

One day the same old priest came to visit El Hafed's successor. He noticed a flash of light from the mantel, and sprang toward it in amazement, and exclaimed, "Here is a diamond! Has El Hafed returned?"

"That is not a diamond; it is a stone I found in the garden," replied the man.

"But I tell you that is a diamond," said the priest. And then the two men went out into the garden, and stirred up the white sand, and there came into their hands beautiful diamonds, more valuable than the first. This story is historically true. It was the discovery of the wonderful mines of Golconda.

The Arab guide who told the story swung his cap and said: "If El Hafed had remained at home and dug in his own garden, he could have been the wealthiest man of his time and the most honored." This is a long story, but if it is thoughtfully read it will lead many to find in their own homes the path of duty in which Christ would have them walk.

It is quite surprising how well satisfied great people, or people who are going to be great, are with doing what might be called "small duties." When Queen Victoria was a little girl she was spending the day with her aunt, who was quite at a loss to know how to entertain the little lady, and so she said to her: "Victoria, you shall amuse yourself just as you wish to-day; choose anything you wish, and you shall do it if it is possible." "I have always wanted to wash windows," the queen-child replied. So the necessary articles were provided for her—pail of water, chamois skin, etc.—and she scrubbed away to her heart's content, no doubt feeling it was her duty to make those windows clean. And when she grew to be the great Queen she spent herself in doing her share of making the world purer and better through the power of the Word of God, for she was truly a Christian queen.

The story is told of an Englishman who went through a slave market in Cairo, and coming upon a black fellow who pleased him, he asked the slave-driver what he would take for him. The black man heard the question, and he thought in his heart that an Englishman had no right to own a slave, and he wished he could put a knife through the man's heart. The Englishman went on and completed the bargain, paying the amount of money demanded and receiving a paper roll, which was a deed. Then he came up to the black man, and handed him the deed, saying, "Here is your liberty," and then he passed him another roll, saying, "Here is some money for you to begin life with." "You don't mean it, sir. Can I do just as I please?" "That is what I mean," replied the Englishman. "If I can do just what I please," replied the black man, "I will go with you and serve you the rest of my life." It is our privilege to be just that sort of a liberty-slave to the Lord Jesus, who has delivered us from the bondage of sin by the price of his own precious life.

Advertisements Have Grown Better

THE following article appeared in the New York Evening Mail, issue of August 8. It indicates the estimation in which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S guarantee is held by the advertising world:

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD recently announced that it would make good any claim made upon it by any subscriber who had been defrauded by any advertiser using its columns. In the same article it asked this question:

"Can the word of the advertising man be depended upon?" and then proceeded to answer it by saying:

"It certainly can in the case of most of the leading publications; in fact, the day has come when deceptive advertising does not pay. Advertising nowadays must have two leading qualities to succeed—attractiveness and truthfulness.

"If it has not attractiveness, people will not read it, and if it has not truthfulness, the ill result which is sure to follow will react upon the business of the advertiser."

Why is there so much discussion everywhere about advertising? Is it not because people have been educated to read advertisements in recent years—is it not because the careful reading of the public has compelled advertisers to be accurate in what they say to the public?

Some years ago, the advertising printed in all publications represented haphazard, exaggerated medleys of statement and the public did not pay very much attention to it. Through the persistent efforts of men in the advertising profession, however, the great part of present-day advertising has become actual news.

No responsible editor of a newspaper deliberately plans to print inaccurate news, and no merchant of character attempts to deceive the people whom he wants to interest in his business.

The advertiser who prints an untruth to-day and follows it up to-morrow with another untruth, and the next day with another untruth, and so on, will find after a while that he has got to have a very fine memory if he wants to avoid being caught in his mis-statements.

The trouble about telling a lie is that you have got to remember it and add to it, and that makes it dangerous. It is so much easier to state facts and so much easier to build a business when the truth is always told.

Whenever any of our subscribers is defrauded by an advertiser in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD we will make good the claim, provided that the subscriber, who must be of record, has mentioned THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in writing to the advertiser, and provided the claim is made to us within two months of the date of the appearance of the advertisement.

This little Brooklyn girl, Suzine Balba, was a sick, illy-nourished baby. NESTLÉ'S FOOD brought her to rosy health.

Nestlé's Food

Will Keep Your Baby Well

We want to send you, entirely free of charge, enough NESTLÉ'S FOOD for twelve meals for your baby, and we want to send you, too, a splendid book called "Infant Feeding and Hygiene," that was written for mothers by great doctors who spend their lives making sick babies well.

If you have met any of the thousands and thousands of mothers who have used NESTLÉ'S in the past—or, if you have met any of the thousands and thousands of babies that were fed on it and are grown up men and women now, we don't need to send you a sample. You know what NESTLÉ'S is and how it will help your baby to resist the Summer troubles that are so often fatal.

But, you are a brand-new mother, maybe, with a brand-new baby; so you want to see for yourself, and all our explaining won't convince you as quickly as those twelve feedings we will give your baby.

Baby Health Rosy cheeks and laughing baby eyes will talk to you better than our scientific explanations; but you really ought to know why NESTLÉ'S has always been so good for babies.

You see, there are lots of mothers still who think that when they have filled a bottle with cow's milk, and given it to the baby, that baby ought to be perfectly satisfied. And yet, doctors have said over and over again that milk as it comes from the cow is no fit food for babies; that it is no substitute for mother's milk and that it brings on more baby deaths in the Summer than all other causes put together.

Cow's milk is full of germs at its best, but in the Summer it is apt to have more sickness in it than food value. It forms into indigestible curds, too (even grown people can't stand them). But science can do many things, and one of the wonderful things it has done is to so change cow's milk that it exactly resembles mother's milk. That's what has been done in NESTLÉ'S FOOD and that is why NESTLÉ'S FOOD is sold in every country of the world.

Triumph of Science NESTLÉ'S FOOD is the richest, best cow's milk, procured in sanitary dairies from selected cows, purified and modified under scientific direction, and reduced to a powder. All you have to do is to add cold water, boil two minutes, and it is all ready for the baby—a light, nutritious food that builds bone and muscle and helps the weak little body to resist disease.

But why tell you more; the sample will tell you better, so send for it quickly.

Send the coupon at once for a free sample and copy of our illustrated book on "Infant Feeding and Hygiene."

The Marks of a Good Watch Case

When men and women buy watches they think of the movement—the "works" as they call it—but rarely of the watch case.

Your jeweler buys watch cases and movements separately and combines them to make a complete watch.

You are particular about the "works" of your watch—you know the maker's name; do you know the name of your watch case? There is room there for adulteration—for low standards—for the cheapening process that creeps in wherever folks pay for anything without knowing about it.

The trade marks illustrated on this page are standard with the fine jewelry trade, and have been for 50 years. They mean absolute integrity in bullion value, in assay, in construction of a watch case.

The Keystone Company was the first to guarantee the wear of gold-filled cases—nowadays the words "guaranteed for 20 years" have become so common that you may find them stamped on a brass case washed with gold. The only real guarantee is the integrity of the maker—the name behind the case.

The marks illustrated on this page are your safeguard; be sure to find them—they are not hard to remember—Keystone for solid gold—Jas. Boss or Crescent for gold filled. Every good jeweler in this country knows the marks and carries the cases. They are made for ladies' or men's watches—plain, engine turned, engraved or enameled—all sizes, all patterns.

THE WAY OUT
What to Do When Food Don't Agree.

When food don't agree sensible folks make a change.

Where all others fail Grape-Nuts being partially predigested and nearly all nourishment, succeeds usually from the first trial.

A lady in Washington says: "My baby 19 months old had never seen a well day in her life. She had suffered from indigestion from the time of her birth, and it seemed impossible to find any food to agree with her. She could keep almost nothing on her stomach and she was in such a constipated condition she suffered a great deal.

"It was then that I tried Grape-Nuts for her, steeping it thoroughly and straining it, putting a small portion in each feeding and it worked like a charm. She began to improve immediately and gained half a pound the first week.

"Baby got her indigestion from me, for my digestive organs have always been weak. I rely on Grape-Nuts for most of my food for there are times when I can eat nothing else. I am steadily improving and know Grape-Nuts will make me entirely well in time.

"I never have 'that tired feeling' anymore. I eat Grape-Nuts and I feel its effects in improved mental strength very forcibly."

"There's a Reason."

New Metropolitan Pastors

By Rev. CHARLES H. MORGAN, Ph.D.
Assistant Editorial Secretary of the Young People's Missionary Movement

THREE new pastors recently had their opening services on three successive Sundays in prominent churches in New York. Dr. Christian F. Reisner, who came from Denver, began in Grace Methodist Episcopal Church, April 24; the Rev. Malcolm J. McLeod, from Pasadena, Calif., opened in the Reformed Collegiate Church of St. Nicholas, May 1; and Dr. Charles L. Slattery, from Springfield, Mass., preached his first sermon as rector of Grace Protestant Episcopal Church, May 8, 1910.

The three churches are, generally speaking, along the Broadway or central line of Manhattan, from the clearly "down-town" location of Grace Episcopal, at Broadway and Tenth Street, to the site of St. Nicholas Reformed, two miles farther up, at Fifth Avenue and Forty-eighth Street, rapidly entering down-town conditions; to Grace Methodist, also feeling the constant changing of population, three miles farther northwest, at One Hundred and Fourth Street, and like the Reformed Church a block or two east of Broadway.

Each of the new incumbents is a preacher of seasoned powers and experience, of early middle age, and each has already measured his strength in dealing successfully with large tasks—and hard ones. Dr. Reisner, of Pennsylvania German stock, two years under forty, born and reared in Kansas, while still a student in theology in Boston grappled with the work in a church that was near the crime centre of the city—an old "New Light" church that had been "lawing" for years so diligently that it never had enough of the Gospel to get an audience. His next charge was a forlorn hope on the outskirts of a Kansas town, with a membership of sixty-eight working people, and a little cottage with a debt on it for church property. In six years they built four additions, and he left the church with 440 members. Then he went in 1903 to a church of 254 members in Denver, with an edifice which no one had been able to fill, and during the seven years before coming to New York he received 2,000 members and left the church with a membership of 900.

Mr. McLeod, of Scotch descent, born forty-two years ago on Prince Edward Island, having ten Presbyterian elders among his uncles, was pastor of two churches in Pennsylvania after finishing his course in theology at Princeton. In college he had been a gold medalist in mathematics and physics, and now following the two pastorates he held for three years the chair of Greek language and literature at the University of Nebraska. Then going to Pasadena, in the nine years before leaving for New York he saw the membership of the First Presbyterian Church of the Pacific Coast city climb from 538 to 1,170.

Dr. Slattery is of New England lineage, and also forty-two years of age. After graduating from Harvard and the Episcopal Theological School at Cambridge, he was for five years head master of Groton School, training boys for college. Next, for eleven years, he was dean of the cathedral at the educational centre of Faribault, Minn., all this time a constant preacher as well as teacher and writer of books, such as Life Beyond Life, on immortality. Three years ago he was called to Christ Church, Springfield, and although the church had possessed the services of a brother of Phillips Brooks as rector, Dr. Slattery effected a phenomenal advance, the three years of the rectorship just terminated witnessing an increase of nearly if not fully one hundred per cent. in communicants.

Dr. Reisner, from settled conviction, is a consistent and persistent advertiser. This is the most distinctive feature of his method, and he has wr books, such as Workable Plans Wide-Awake Churches, and lectur the problem of "The Congregatio Church and its Cure." Two or weeks after his pastorate opene had a rose presented to each pers the evening audience, and preache "Beauty, Grace and Fragrance." Sunday evening after Colonel R velt landed the sermon was "Is R velt a Christian?" and a picture o ex-President was given to each at ant. The spirit of his evening vices is informal, homelike, and ant. The pastor directs the singi two or three hymns, some of whic fitted to awaken old-time mem The room is darkened and he s and explains pictures relating Gospel topics. The sermon of twelve minutes is sensational, bu unfavorably so. There are hum passages, also passages tender tearful. At the close ten or t persons raise their hands for pr There is a hush that tells that hearts of the people have been m After dismissal pastor and wife in the spacious vestibule of the ence room, also many members o church, greeting strangers and ta with each other.

Dr. Reisner says: "I aim alwa keep the services in a happy a spiritual atmosphere, and in one or another I give the invitation to who wish to seek Christ almost e Sunday night. I make three t sand calls a year. Many business whom I have visited, often regard skeptics, have opened to me hearts. My churches give a great of attention to social life. Eve these times I find it easy to talk Christ."

The key to Mr. McLeod's minist "intellectual evangelism." "The of the present age," he says, "is tinctly spiritual—for the voice prophet." "We are to cultivate department of publicity," he writ one of his books. "Advertising i secret of success in the world of merce. . . . Our work is to forth a glad story, a story that not be told by science, or art, or li ture. Men's lives can be changed made completely anew."

Each of the three pastors, way, disclaims dependence on "i titutional" methods. Their chief liance will be upon a living mes from a warm, sympathetic, huma seeking heart. So, while the his church at Broadway and Tenth S has a wider range of activities, in a three-fold ministry—to the bod its communicants and supporters, live wholly at a distance; to the munity at Grace Chapel, Thirte and Fourteenth Streets and First nue; to the whole neighborhood ar Grace Church—yet it would sum u its ministry under two words, pu that is the pulpit, and personal. Slattery, like the others, is a "m hunter" in the name and for the of his Master. Though the out pulpit at Grace Church was one o fine conceptions of Dr. Huntington therefore is an inheritance to his cessor, yet the spirit of Dr. Slatt makes it very fitting that he shoul the first to occupy it, for he say the last paragraph of his book Present-day Preaching: "Men ev where, whether or not they know it hungry for the Lord Jesus Christ. is the preacher's lot to manifest h sympathy, in help, in love, to t whose need is great."

Each of these men wonderf exalts Jesus Christ. Mr. McLeod s "If we preach the riches of Jesus have a great, rich, tremendous nopoly. He is the exalted Lord; the last in a row. We do not ad him; we adore him."

Young People's Societies

Christ Our Saviour*

OUR forefathers were not so much impressed with Christ's mission to ve us from sin, as with his purpose save us from the consequences of sin. Our generation is much more interested in the pressing, immediate problem of the deliverance of our poor, weak souls from the daily attacks of the evil one. Undoubtedly the future holds a terrible retribution of some sort for the being who wilfully defies God; but we feel that we may leave that matter confidently with him. The God of all the earth will judge aright and portion out to us whatever is best. The matter which most vitally concerns us to-day is the disposition which each one of us is to make of this great fact of life. Are we to throw it away as if it were a worthless bauble, "fulfilling," as Paul says, "the lusts of the flesh," and obeying "the law of sin and death"? Or shall we devote our time and our talents to the spreading of Christ's light, the "strengthening of the brethren," and the strenuous effort to follow in the footsteps of the Master?

Sin had been recognized, from the first moment of man's intelligence, as the origin of mortal woes; but the idea of any divine aid to overcome this insidious and universal foe seems to have been the exclusive property of the elect people.

Other nations made gods and prayed to them for the purposes of temporal salvation — salvation from sickness, death, loss of property, and national calamity. But that a god could enter the heart of a man, brush it clean of sensuality and selfishness, and inspire him to the attainment of constantly higher and higher levels of morality and spirituality—of such a belief on the part of the ancient heathen nations we have no record.

The advent of Christ was revolutionary in many senses, but, perhaps, most of all in establishing this fundamental theory: that the great enemy of mankind is sin, and that the spirit of Christ, the Comforter, can overcome this subtlest and deadliest of foes. No man will but accept of his aid.

Among a certain class of people it has sometimes been a habit to speak of religious men as "mollycoddles," as though to devote one's self openly to the service of Christ were a small and silly thing.

At the great Church Federation meeting in Philadelphia in 1908, Dr. Gunning of Boston said some good things on this subject.

"We are discovering," he remarked, "that Christian life and service is a man's job. Theodore Roosevelt has made it a man's job. Mr. Bryan has made it a man's job. Mr. Taft has made it a man's job. He says that he has learned that the only hope for civilization in the world is to have that civilization based on the teaching of Jesus Christ.

"Dr. Wilfred Grenfell, of Labrador, has learned that religion is a man's job. He has remarked, 'You can say anything about me that you like, but don't say anything about my "sacrifice." That is rot. I am in this job because I like it. There is no sacrifice about it.'"

The acceptance of Christ's salvation and the labor to carry out his directions are truly "a man's job." It involves a fight to which the battles of the flesh are "as moonlight unto sunlight."

It is to this great and noble moral conflict that the service of Christ invites us; and, as Dr. Grenfell so manfully said of his hard mission, it is no sacrifice. We should hail the opportunity, for one mighty to save walketh ever beside us to uphold our weak hands and strengthen our wavering hearts.

*Christian Endeavor Topic for Sunday, September 4. TEXT: John 3:5-21.

Rally Day*

LETTERS often come to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, asking what advantage is to be derived from holding conventions, joining federations, or combining with other societies.

One of these letters, of recent date, inquires concerning the benefit to a small and weak chapter, of forming a county association, with meetings once or twice a year, or oftener.

It is probably possible to overfederate; but, as a rule, "in union there is strength."

It is a mysterious power which is exerted by such unions. Perhaps a comparison of it with light, heat or electricity (all of which are considered by some scientists to be merely different manifestations of the same force) may not be amiss.

But, even if we may not explain it, scarcely one who has passed through the experience will deny that a life-impetus and a deep spirit-stirring often follow such gatherings. They may and do produce results such as come from nothing else.

The best of societies is always likely to fall into ruts. If you go where many varieties of conduct and programme are described, you must be very dull if you cannot glean several new ideas for your own chapter.

It is a good plan to invite once in a while some outside speaker to address your chapter. A fresh voice now and then adds greatly to the interest and value of your meetings, especially your rally meetings. At a large county or State or national gathering, you hear the best speakers and know upon whom to call when you desire one yourself.

These speakers cannot often come without more or less pay. In order to provide this you may have to sell tickets, or circulate a subscription paper. Neither one is a pleasant thing to do, but it may be a good thing, just the same. You learn ways of managing such matters at your convention.

Remember that it is a good thing to keep moving. The dead society has nothing going on. Your periodical rally day furnishes an important break in the regular routine.

Remember, too, that few people care much for that which costs them nothing. Without unduly emphasizing the matter, it is not a bad thing to keep constantly in an unobtrusive way before your chapter that it is worth paying something for; and that the members must expect to give not only considerable time and thought and strength to it, but some money.

Emerson somewhere alludes to the additional "fury of performance" which is gained by the concerted action of many over that of one by himself or a few. We spur each other on. One suggests a thought to another. Waves of deep emotion melt a large audience, as seldom small ones; and while the nature is thus softened, indelible impressions may be made upon it.

It is not often that a child taught entirely at home under governesses and tutors gets the vital spirit of study and desire for improvement, or even the same amount of knowledge, that come to a child under a similar quality of teaching in a good school.

It is often said that we learn as much from hearing the class recite as from personal study. A home-taught child misses this privilege. Most minds undoubtedly work better under the stimulating influence of wholesome competition and emulation. These should be kindly and unselfish, but they are generally beneficial. Your rally-day should furnish many of the good features of the larger gatherings.

Annihilator of Space

To be within arm's reach of distant cities it is only necessary to be within arm's reach of a Bell Telephone. It annihilates space and provides instantaneous communication, both near and far.

There can be no boundaries to a telephone system as it is now understood and demanded. Every community is a center from which people desire communication in every direction, always with contiguous territory, often with distant points. Each individual user may at any moment need the long distance lines which radiate from his local center.

An exchange which is purely local has a certain value. If, in addition to its local connections, it has connections with other contiguous localities, it has a largely increased value.

If it is universal in its connections and inter-communications, it is indispensable to all those whose social or business relations are more than purely local.

A telephone system which undertakes to meet the full requirements of the public must cover with its exchanges and connecting links the whole country.

The Bell Telephone System annihilates space for the business man to-day. It brings him and any of his far-away social or business interests together.

The Gardens of the World Pay Tribute to the Armour Toilet Soap

From the farthest corners of the earth; from mountain and valley, jungle and plain, some new and rare perfume is constantly being forwarded by our representatives.

And in our great experimental laboratories these delicate essences are tested, tried out and adapted to your use.

We take toll, too, of the best of the world's most famous garden spots. Wherever a particular combination of earth and sun and air have produced an especially delicate flower-perfume, we bespeak the supply.

Violets nestling among the sun-kissed hills of Northern Italy; lilies nurtured beneath the Mediterranean skies of Southern France; lavender clinging to the sides of the snow-capped, mighty Alps; aromatic sandalwood from the storied groves of India; delicate ylang-ylang from the land of the Rising Sun; roses from deep-set Balkan valleys—all these and many more, yield up their best at our demand.

Try today any or all of the following products. A single trial will be enough to convince you. You can get them at all good dealers.

Dealers all over the country are displaying these products in their windows. The windows are decorated to resemble this advertisement, in general appearance. Look for, and buy at those stores.

Sylvan Soap

represents the perfection of modern toilet-soap production. It is scientifically prepared and chemically pure.

It cleanses perfectly, yet with so gentle a touch that the most tender skin is soothed. And it leaves the skin softened, vitalized—glowing with the bloom of health.

Delicate, distinctive perfumes lend to Sylvan the last touch of desirability. You may choose from six of these—heliotrope, carnation, violet, lilac, sandalwood and rose.

Yet, though the most dainty woman could demand no more, the price is but 10c the cake at your dealer's.

Supertar

has been aptly termed "The best friend of the hair."

For a Supertar shampoo stimulates, while thoroughly cleansing the scalp. It is a foe to dandruff and similar affections which destroy the hair. And it leaves the hair soft, fluffy, lustrous, "live."

Supertar lathers instantly — rich and snowy white—in hard or soft water. And it affords an ideal massage.

Pressed, thoroughly seasoned and free from excess moisture, it long outlasts ordinary shampoo soaps, of which a large part wastes away with each day's use.

Let your hair have the delight of a perfect shampoo.

Transparosa

is a clear, transparent soap, every glint of light in whose amber depths sends back a message of purity to the skin.

It is perfumed with a wonderfully delicate yet lasting attar of roses, which it took thousands of tests to perfect.

Sylvan Toilet Talcum Powder is of exceptionally high quality, and light as thistledown.

It is borated and antiseptic, and most beneficial in cases of chafed, irritated skin, sunburn, prickly heat or chapped hands. It affords a delightful aftermath to a shave or a bath, and is invisible on application.

No other powder has ever approached it in delicacy of fragrance. There are five odors—violet, carnation, lilac, heliotrope and sandalwood. It is sold by all druggists.

Try one, or better still, try all of these articles. Each is its own best advocate. And we are content to abide by your judgment.

Questions and Answers

In forwarding MSS. to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, enclose stamped envelopes for return, if unavailable.

G. E. C., Hampden Highlands, Me. Will you give a few facts about the dark day in New England in 1780?

The darkness extended over most of New England, part of New York and New Jersey, on Friday, May 19, 1780. The cause has never been known.

W. T. B., Sumner, Wash. Is a firm resolve to henceforth live a Christian life "conversion"?

Conversion literally means "a turning towards or together"—the natural man towards God (II. Cor. 5: 19). It differs from proselytism in that the latter is purely of the intellect, conversion being totally independent of dogmas or creeds. In no very measured terms, Jesus condemns proselytism (Matt. 23: 15). Conversion is wholly of the Spirit, manifest through the life and conduct (Jas. 2: 14-26). The best rule of conduct is to study and follow the example of Jesus (John 5: 40). How would Jesus think, speak, or act if placed in like conditions as I am? Dismiss forever this fear of afterward "being lost" (John 10: 28, 29). No man is infallible; all are liable to make mistakes or errors. There is a difference between these and deliberate sins. God's righteousness is pledged to forgive mistakes or errors (I. John 1: 9, in the original).

F. L., Avalon, Mo. Who is now the Prince of Wales?

The present Prince of Wales is the eldest son of George V. and is named Edward Albert Christian George Andrew Patrick David. He was born June 23, 1894.

S. M. W., Missouri. Explain I. Tim. 2: 9 and I. Pet. 3: 3.

Among the Jews and Greeks of the early Christian churches, personal adornment was expressly forbidden for females attending the meetings for worship and spiritual instruction, lest they should distract the attention of the worshipers. This ordinance was later further extended to ordain that females should only be permitted to attend such meetings behind latticed screens. The passages referred to only applied to Christian services for worship; otherwise, on occasions of social gatherings, meetings at the wells, or wedding feasts, no restriction was placed on adornment in garb or jewels. It is a mistake to consider Paul or any of the apostles as woman-haters. The esteem in which Lydia, Priscilla, Eunice, Lois, and many others were held completely refutes this idea. In the beginning God endowed the man with physical strength and the woman with charm and beauty, and it is the duty of each to conserve and enhance these God-bestowed gifts as much in the one case as the other. They were alike for the glory of God, and are not to be despised.

Mrs. E. C. D., Port Dickinson, N. Y. Has the place been found where the ancient Egyptians quarried the granite used in building the great pyramids?

Yes. It was from the Morattam and Zura hills on the opposite side of the Nile. Traces of the road over which the stone was transported are still to be seen.

N. W. L., Chicago, Ill. Explain the connection between Matt. 2: 15 and Hos. 11: 1; also between Matt. 2: 18 and Jer. 31: 15. What is meant by "the kingdom" in such passages as Matt. 3: 2, 17, etc.? Can these passages refer to the millennium?

The first two chapters of Matthew's Gospel are introductory and prefatory to the real subject of the Evangel. Matthew was an educated man, familiar with the rabbinical teachings, hence his many references to prophetical writings. Every student of the Midrash and Talmud must be familiar with the laborious method in which the rabbis tortured and strained meanings, often impracticable, from their Scriptures; and Matt. 2: 15 is an example. There is no connection between this verse and Hos. 11: 1; the two incidents are totally independent of each other. By no manner of means can a coincidence or similarity be construed as a prophecy. Hosea simply relates a well-known historical incident, without imputing to his words any future significance; though the conveying of the child Jesus into Egypt and return thence amounts to a historic parallelism. On the other hand, the "slaughter of the innocents" was clearly a fulfilment of the prophecy of Jeremiah, in every particular, even to geographical and genealogical location. The expression "kingdom of heaven" or "kingdom of God" is capable of three applications, to which the context always gives the key; first, in the heart of man; second, in his social surroundings; and third, universal and throughout the world; each of these being stages of progressive growth. The last and final stage has been termed "millennium," for which all believers ought to be in prayerful and expectant attitude —rightcousness triumphant over every form of evil.

C. F. J., Canton, O. 1. Please describe the famous "Peacock Throne" of Persia. 2. Also the famous white robe in which Alexander Dowie was buried. 3. Why is "rounding the Horn" so dangerous?

1. The "Peacock Throne" was brought from Delhi by Nadir Shah. It is covered with gold and precious stones and is valued at $13,000,000. 2. No account of this is accessible. He often preached in a wonderfully embroidered white satin robe, with much gold upon it. 3. Cape Horn is a desolate rock, 1,390 feet high. Fearful winds circle around it. It is a region noted for storms.

The Flooded City of Changteh, Hunan Province, China

HUNAN, one of the largest and most popular of China's provinces, is now undergoing a double affliction—flood and famine. A torrential rain fell lasting eight days, swelling the rivers. The Yuen River rose twenty-five feet in three days. Over one thousand persons perished by drowning, besides great numbers of cattle. The low-lying rice lands are now covered and the crop has been ruined. Missionary T. J. Preston, of the American Presbyterian Mission, Changteh, writes us making an appeal for the flood sufferers, who number many thousands. Famine has followed the flood, and is increasing daily. In one district of a hundred square miles, there will be no crops. Mr. Preston adds that during the past winter and spring, thousands have died of hunger and famine fever, in addition to those drowned by the recent floods. Above Changteh, entire villages were swept away. Two other missionaries, Messrs. J. W. Owen, China Inland Mission, and E. F. Stewart, Christian Missionary Alliance, unite with Mr. Preston in asking aid for the distressed population.

N. S. B., Haven, Kan. Does the original Greek text contain the words "and these three are one," in I. John 5: 7? Also, "who is over all, God blessed for ever. Amen," in Rom. 9: 5?

No part of I. John 5: 7, as given in the Authorized Version, appears in the oldest Greek manuscripts. The verse is evidently an interpolation of later date. Different is the case with the quotation from Rom. 9: 5. In the latter instance, owing to a difficult Greek idiom and diversity in the Latin Vulgate, it is merely a question of variety of interpretation. For English readers the best authority at present in such cases is a copy of the Revised Version, containing marginal notes.

C. J. L., Holland, Mich. What is meant by "falling from grace"?

"Falling from grace" does not imply a state of being eternally lost. All are liable to mistakes, which necessarily involve more or less deprivation of blessing. Mistakes and errors do not come under the category of deliberate sin, which latter is impressively condemned by Jesus in Matt. 12: 45, and by Paul in Heb. 6: 4-6. On the other hand, I. John 1: 9 pledges the righteousness of God to forgive our errors (for so it is expressed in the original) on due repentance and humble confession.

P. E. O., Elmer, Mo. In Ex. 17: 12, what did Moses' hands raised or stretched out represent? Did Num. 21: 9 and Ex. 17: 12 signify the same?

It was simply a natural attitude of earnest and urgent prayer. There is no connection between this attitude of Moses and the elevated brazen serpent. The latter was intended as an object for concentration of the mind of the sufferer while praying for relief and healing. The command to look towards it was a test of obedience and trust. In itself, the emblem had no virtue. Latterly, when the Israelites were settled in their land, it became an object of idolatrous worship, and was destroyed by the order of King Hezekiah (II. Kings 18: 4), the king taking occasion in his proclamation to designate it "a piece of brass." The uplifted serpent has frequently been used as symbolical of the elevation of Jesus on the cross, both being for purposes of healing; but the righteous act of King Hezekiah ought to warn us against degrading the spiritual in worship to worship of any material symbol.

F. M. H., Atlantic City, N. J. What is the chronology of the Pentateuch?

This is and always will remain vague and unsettled. All scholars are agreed in esteeming the Samaritan version of these books as the most reliable and authentic; even the Alexandrian Jews in the reign of Ptolemy so considered the Samaritan version. It was from the Samaritan and Jerusalem versions that the Septuagint was compiled and modeled.

S. B., Oakesdale, Wash. Can you cite a passage in the Bible where it tells how long Noah was in building the ark?

No. Antediluvian chronology, being necessarily founded on tradition, is exceedingly vague and uncertain. In Gen. 5: 32 we are told he had reached the age of five hundred years before the birth of his three sons. According to Gen. 7: 11, Noah was six hun[dred] years and two months old when he, with [his] wife and sons, entered in the ark. There i[s no] Biblical record of the age of Shem at [this] period; but according to Gen. 6: 18 he [was] already married. This would fix the buildin[g of] the ark in the closing years of that cent[ury]; and that is the nearest we can get to [any] decisive information on the subject. Gen. 3 (which you probably have in mind) refer[s to] the divine purpose of shortening the spa[n of] human life.

Mrs. W. F., Exira, Ia. Can you tell me wh[ether] many churches believe in infant bapti[sm]? Have we anything in the Bible to prov[e it]?

See Acts 16: 15, 33 and I. Cor. 1: 16. [In] these and other households there must [have] been children of immature age. The ordin[ance] of baptism in the Christian Church was [in]tended to take the place of circumcision in [the] Jewish Church, and the latter applied to e[very] child.

C. H. D., Cedarville, N. J. Give the mea[ning] of Eph. 4: 11 and 12 concerning "the [per]fecting of the saints."

While the Messiah by divine appointm[ent] was on earth, for the work of reconciling [the] world unto God, he bestowed special gifts [on] certain individuals, ordaining "some to [be] apostles, and some prophets, and some evan[ge]lists, and some pastors and teachers"; for [the] after carrying-on of his work "to the per[fect]ing of the saints; unto the work of minister[ing]; unto the building up of the body of Chri[st]; they, in their turn, choosing and ordain[ing] spiritually enlightened successors for [the] work of the same ministry "till we all att[ain] unto the unity of the faith and of the kn[ow]ledge of the Son of God." The true and succ[ess]ful ministry must be founded on a spiri[tual] basis alone; no other qualification is wo[rthy] of consideration.

R. M., Dayton, O. Are we to understand [by] reading Judges 11: 30, 31, 39 that Jepht[hah] actually offered up his daughter as a sa[cri]fice?

Both the Authorized and Revised Vers[ions] leave the question in doubt and commenta[tors] have been divided in opinion as to whether [she] was sacrificed or doomed to live the life o[f a] recluse. Human sacrifices are an abomina[tion] unto the Lord. A new reading or transla[tion] which several notable scholars have urged [as] the correct one is: "It shall surely be the Lo[rd] or I will offer up to him a burnt offeri[ng]." Hebrew scholars declare this to be the m[ore] accurate rendering. It changes the aspect [of] the case and makes Jephthah to say practic[ally] that if the first living thing that came fo[rth] from his house to meet him was one that w[ould] be unacceptable, then a burnt offering of [an] acceptable character would be substituted. T[his] would lead to the conclusion that the daugh[ter] was not sacrificed, but condemned to a life [of] perpetual virginity and a burnt-offering offe[red] up in her stead.

W. B., Goshen, Mass. Am I right in say[ing] that the Jews as a nation did not seek [to] approach God individually, but rat[her] through divinely appointed mediums, or [the] ministry of the priests and high pries[ts]?

No; the truly devout Jew needed no int[er]mediary when he wished to approach God [in] prayer. The priestly office was ordered [to] maintained solely for the sacrificial services [in] the tabernacle and temple. The Jewish litu[rgy] always has contained express formulas [for] family worship and personal devotion. [The] Jewish Encyclopaedia says: "The observan[ces] of the faith are so entwined with the every-[day] customs of the home as to make the Jew[ish] religion and the family life one, a bond [of] sanctity." In the feasts of Passover, Tab[er]nacles, Purim, etc., the patriarch of the hou[se]hold always leads the devotional services.

The Belgian Group of Buildings at the Exposition

The "Grand Terrace" in the British Section

Brussels' "White City" Swept by Fire

THE pride of Belgium, the "White City" of the World's Fair—the name by which Europeans have known the Brussels and International Universal Exposition — was partially destroyed by fire on August 14. An electric spark in the telegraph building fell among inflammable material. A blaze soon burst forth, and as there was a high wind at the time, the fire was quickly carried to the other Exposition buildings. Soon the Belgian, English and French sections were a mass of fire, which defied the united efforts of the soldiers and the fire companies.

Within a few hours, property worth $10,000,000 was reduced to a pile of smoking ashes. At the time of the fire breaking out, the Exposition grounds were crowded with sightseers, there being over a hundred thousand present, and a panic seemed inevitable. Most of the exits became choked with people crowding to get away, and many were injured by being crushed and trodden under foot. As far as known, however, only two died, although the list of injured exceeds half a hundred. Firemen came from Antwerp to help out the local firefighters, and tried to check the conflagration by the use of dynamite. They succeeded after much hard work in saving many of the buildings.

Among the beautiful structures damaged were the Italian, Russian, Austrian, Japanese, Chinese, Norwegian, English and French buildings. The American section, too, was partially destroyed. Forty houses on the Avenue Solbosch, adjoining the grounds, were also burned. The beautiful façade in front of the Kermesse tumbled in ruins after burning a short time. It seemed as though the beautiful buildings were mere tinder-boxes, so quickly did they crumble under the flames. Great tongues of fire flashed and darted far up into the sky, and showers of sparks and flying embers were carried from building to building.

Many of the exhibits were uninsured, and the loss to jewelry exhibitors is a heavy one. Priceless treasures in tapestry, painting and sculpture were damaged, principally by water, and some exhibits in the English, Belgian, Persian and Turkish sections, including valuable rugs, medals, and even diplomas, are almost a total loss. It is said that during the panic which prevailed in almost every section of the Exposition, some wild animals escaped from their cages in the Zoo. Attempts were made by gangs of thieves to loot the burned buildings, but these were quickly checked by the police.

The Famous Kermesse at the Brussels Exposition, Destroyed by Fire

Notwithstanding the fire, there are so many of the buildings still intact that an effort will be made to repair the damage with a view to reopening the Exposition. The officials say the Belgian and British sections were the heaviest sufferers. The American art exhibit fortunately was in a building two miles distant from the conflagration. A collection of jewels valued at $3,000,000 and owned by Belgians, was dug out of the ruins unharmed the day after the fire.

Although the Kermesse, with its water chutes, toboggan slides and other attractions, was destroyed, the flames were kept in check long enough before reaching some of the larger buildings to enable the firemen and police to save much that was of value in the line of paintings, marbles and antique furniture. Among the articles thus fortunately saved was the fine collection of 8,000 Gobelin tapestries. In the British section the losses included the fine gallery of Tudor paintings from the Toronto Museum and a lot of rare tapestries and antique furniture, the whole collection being insured for $500,000.

The "White City" stands near the end of the Avenue Louise on the west side of the Belgian metropolis. The national Belgian building faces the main entrance, and the Kermesse stood toward the left. Around a great oblong of beautiful gardens are the French, German, Holland and Italian concessions. One of the picturesque attractions was a reproduction of the house of Rubens, which was saved. In the pavilion was a collection of Flemish art of the period of Rubens, which was at once historic and priceless. A correspondent writes: "Special sections of the Exposition were devoted to education, works of art, instruments and methods connected with letters, sciences and arts; the plant and general methods connected with machinery, electricity, civil engineering and means of transport, agriculture, horticulture and arboriculture, forestry, hunting and shooting, fisheries, fruit gathering, foodstuffs, mining and metallurgy, decoration and furnishing of public buildings and private houses, yarns, textile fabrics and clothing, chemical industry, social economy, public health and charitable institutions, practical education, economic institutions and female handicraft, trade and colonization, land and sea forces, sports, congresses and conferences."

King Albert of Belgium formally opened the Exposition on April 30. To rehabilitate it after the fire will probably occupy several months.

The American Pulpit

A SERMON BY

Rev. Frederick F. Shannon, D.D.*

IN THE UPPER ROOM

TEXT—Acts 1:13

"And when they were come in, they went up into an upper room."

AND where had they come in from? Why, from the mount called Olivet, from the mount of holy wonder, from the mount whence their Lord was taken up, from the mount upon which the white-appareled men looked down. And whither had they come to? Why, to the upper room—the place of prayer, of supplication, of heart-searching, of expectant waiting. And what occurred in the upper room? Well, for one thing, there was cradled the spiritual infant which has developed into the stalwart giant named Modern Civilization. Foreign missions, home missions, commerce, the arts, the sciences—everything worth keeping in the twentieth century—had its embryonic beginning in that upper room, the next door to Pentecost. For another thing, the upper room was the place where God set the fashion, in a new and hitherto unexampled manner, of unfolding his plan through the Christian æons. Men speak of bends in the stream of human history. Pentecost was not so much a bend in the stream of history as a widening of the stream to swallow up all bends. Pentecost was simply the lifting up of the everlasting doors, by the King of Glory newly arrived from Olivet, that the river of life, flowing from under the throne of God and of the Lamb, might deluge the nations with its fertilizing waves.

A Sacred Gathering-Place

The upper room, then, was not a gathering place for disappointed fanatics. Rather, it was the first wireless station Christ communicated with after his emergence into the unseen. Though related to each other as cause and effect, as preparation and fulfilment, I propose to use the terms upper room and Pentecost interchangeably. What is their significance for you and me, as we thread our way through the ongoing years?

I. Consider, in the first place, that the upper room signifies the possibility of the soul's relationship with the highest. Pausing upon the threshold of this sacred shrine, we are profoundly impressed with the sense of correspondence: "They were all with one accord in one place." There had been, of course, spiritual commerce with the invisible world before. Probably the first man began at once to search for the God who made him. But after the Word had become flesh and passed into the unseen universe, a larger, clearer, more intelligible communion was thereby established for all souls in Christ. Our ascending Lord threw up a new spiritual highway along which all prayers go straight to the heart of the Father. Christ speaks of the Father as endearingly as a boy away from home speaks of his mother. "Now I go my way to him that sent me." But he was returning thither not as he came. Out of the heights of Deity Christ had entered into the depths of humanity. Wearing the lost human pearl upon his divine finger, he now returns to the heavenly hinterlands as humanity's Priest and King. Now all of his generous promises are ready to be drawn upon. Already he had said: "It is expedient for you that I go away: for if I go not away the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will send him unto you." Then, after conquering death and the grave, he "commanded them that they should not depart from Jerusalem, but wait for the promise of the Father, which, saith he, ye have heard of me."

What Pentecost Means

This, then, is the abiding meaning of Pentecost: It is the privilege of all souls to come into sweet and tender relations with God. "The advent of the divine personality of Christ in the flesh has given the Eternal the experience of what it is to be human; it has established a kinship between God and man which has evolved and planted love into the religious sentiment, wholly changing the look of the unseen universe, and the relations of man to God. The awe of the infinite is softened and the distance upwards shortened and access made easy." The big business of every soul is to claim the kinship already established. For Christianity proclaims the privilege of right relations with God. Oh, why not seize the privilege now? You will never have a more auspicious moment, my friend. And think of the boon, the benefit, the gift—the gift is life, pure, deep, satisfying, eternal life!

* Pastor, Grace M. E. Church, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Looking out over the earth these summer days, we behold a gallery of living beauty. Even our back yards put the Louvre and Vatican galleries to shame. For Titian's reds and Raphael's golds, we have God's whites and greens and blues and pinks and yellows. Look at that red, red rose nodding to its fair white sister across your neighbor's fence. Look at that honeysuckle, shaking its perfumed sweetness down the morning air. And look at that little mother bird, the busiest housekeeper in the whole community. Now she darts down upon the grass, seizes the family lunch without asking permission of the maid, and then springs back to her young in their home among the whispering leaves. Now, answer me: Can a rose get on without the sun? Can grass get on without the rain? Can wings get on without the atmosphere? Certainly not. No more can your soul get on without improving its privilege of spiritual accordance, of heavenly correspondence. Our Father God designs the abundant life of spiritual enrichment for all of his children. And through Christ we are all become privileged partakers of the divine nature.

But correspondence is not all that transpired in the upper room. Correspondence is but the earthly prelude to the heavenly response. "And suddenly there came a sound from heaven as of a rushing mighty wind, and it filled all the house where they were sitting." Here is the law, then, as fixed as gravity, as universal as ether: "Wherever you challenge the higher possibilities of the universe, it reacts upon you with entire generosity." In a word, correspondence on earth necessitates response from heaven. For what is religion? "Religion," says William Wynne Peyton, "is the response of the human soul to the drawing of the infinite Power and Eternal Father in the spiritual universe, the inscrutable in man, the eternal in personality." And what is the Christian religion? Religion is the response of the finite to the appeal of the infinite. The psalmist knew: "When thou saidst, Seek ye my face, my heart said unto thee, Thy face, Lord, will I seek." The Christian religion is the child's cheek turned to receive the Father's kiss.

The Response from Heaven

O my brethren, I am talking about the eternal confidences, the permanent realities, the spiritual certitudes, the unaging values. The upper room, and the golden stream of transfiguring power flowing therefrom, make us spiritually scientific. With becoming awe, we tremble amid such august revelations. At the same time, we rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory. "We are led by a scientific logic to an Unseen," say Professors Tait and Stewart, "and by scientific analogy to the spirituality of this Unseen. In fine, our conclusion is, that the visible universe has been developed by an intelligence resident in the Unseen." And what I am saying now is: Since Christ passed into the heavens, there has been an increasingly deepening spiritual pressure upon the souls of men and of matter. The intelligence resident in the Unseen is an emphatically Christian intelligence. That is the imperial truth of Pentecost. Therefore, I say, the measure and swiftness of response from heaven is conditioned only by the measure of our correspondence on earth. As the eye is made for light, the ear for sound, the mouth for taste, the hand for touch, so the spirit of man is made for the habitation of the Spirit of God. The release of human personality is thus realized, together with its direction and fulfilment. The truth is nobly expressed by our great American mystic: "There is a Soul at the centre of nature and over the will of every man, so that none of us can wrong the universe. The whole course of things goes to teach us faith. We need only obey. There is a guidance for each of us, and by lowly listening we shall hear the right word." Unquestionably. If the flower catches the right raindrop, if the blade of grass holds the right pearl of dew, if the leaf infolds the right wave of sunlight, why should not thy obedient, listening soul hear the right word from heaven? It is all a matter of spiritual attitude, of Christian correspondence. Let a man but open his soul toward heaven, and instantly the Christliness which gladdens the face of the universe will flood his being. The challenge to each heart is: "Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you." Why, the asking, seeking, knocking soul makes all heaven tremble with holy, musical, rapturous joy. And is thus, also, that heaven gets freshened opportuni to come earthward. Every prayer is a spiritu rivulet through which the water of life flows dov to us. Yea, flows down to us that it may bear on its wondrous tide farther and ever farther in the heart of Him in whom we live and move a have our being.

II. Consider, secondly, that the upper room sig fies the energy of the invisible Christ personaliz in human souls. Before vanishing into the worl beyond, he had said: "Ye shall receive power aft that the Holy Spirit is come upon you." And f what specific purpose were they to be empowere "And ye shall be witnesses unto me both in Jerus lem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto t uttermost part of the earth." Here, then, was o Lord's pre-Pentecostal programme. Was it beg at Pentecost, and is it still being unfolded in t life of the race? Surely, history and experien affirm both the individualizing and socializi power of our Lord's reign from his concealed abod in glory.

The Divine Fire in Man's Soul

First, there is the individualizing power of h personal sovereignty: "And there appeared un them cloven tongues like as of fire, and it sat upo each of them." This is God's way of unlocking t treasures hidden behind the closed doors of huma personality. For only the Pentecostal fire can illu mine the depth, the richness, the magnificence undisclosed individuality. Now each life may hav its pure vestal flame raying forth the living G enshrined within. For since Christ the Lord s down at the right hand of the majesty on high, t inmost heart of the universe has opened its joy an peace, its silken tendernesses, its vernal freshnesse to the might and mystery, the yearning and burn ing of the single solitary soul. Souls are not lik raindrops, single as they fall from the skies, lost they merge into the vast and tumbling sea. Sou are as separate as blades of grass, each with its ow bit of green, each with its own soldierlike upright ness as it sentinels the passing breeze. And th worlds are so made that no man can escape fro God and himself. When a man can climb over th walls of the universe, it will be time enough to tal of his getting along without God.

Still, each man comes to his true soul stature onl as he allows the divine fire to be kindled in his ow spirit. Pentecost sublimes the personal soul wit the God-consciousness, whose fine white flower i Christian experience, and whose "best fruits," say Professor James, "are the best things history has t show." For example, Paul is explained by th spreading flames of Pentecost, burning downwar from the splendor-crowned heights to the innermos reaches of his personality. In that spiritual hea his pharisaic dross is utterly consumed, while hi veins of apostolic gold are hinted, and then full uncovered, by the incessant working of viewles energies. Augustine, four centuries later, experi enced a like redemptive, purifying flame in the Mila garden, when the commanding voice said: "Tak up, and read; take up, and read!" Oliver Cromwel speaks of his upper room—"what he, with unspeak able joy, would name his conversion," says Carlyl —on this wise: "I hated godliness, yet God ha mercy on me. Oh, the riches of his mercy!" Savo narola used to refer to his new life by saying: " word did it." Yet none ever knew what that wor was. In our own time, there has hardly been brighter spiritual radiance than was shed by Hugh Price Hughes. And his biographer tells us tha Hughes' Pentecost was "the prelude of a singula bursting forth of his mental powers. The openin of the doors of the spirit was also that of the mind." Thus do the centuries affirm the brightening glow of the Pentecostal fire in the souls of the twice-born Thus does the personalized energy of the hidde Christ quicken the individual into spiritual prowes and eternal worth. Thus that antique upper roo has widened until its dimensions are coextensiv with the universe. And thus, also, has that littl company multiplied until now every heart in th wide world may experience the quiver and thrill o celestial harmonies. The Holy Spirit besieging Man soul—this bestirs the antiquity in us and billows th deeps.

Second, there is also the socializing power of our Lord's reign from the unseen: "And they were all filled with the Holy Spirit." Oh, the augustness, the loftiness, the majesty of the Divine activities here! Each man is gifted with his own tongue of flame, each has the walls of his own being widened out into the immensities, each has his own separate faculties harmonized in spiritual attunement—in brief, each man comes to complete self-realization in God. That is the first item in the Pentecostal programme—the fulfilment, the enrichment, of individuality. The second is the Christianization of society: "And they were all filled with the Holy Spirit." The overarching genius of Christianity is this: it demands the best for each, it demands the best for all. It transforms society by regenerating the individual. It fulfils the individual by his brothering of society. Each is essential to both, and both are essential to each.

Now, our own time is especially pregnant with social movements. The mystic human sea is all astir with unrest. In some quarters, wild tongues are loosed that hold not God in awe, nor man, nor devil. In other sections, we are all being theoretically winged to everlasting bliss by the angel of evolution. I have no word to utter against the angel. He is doing, as always, his noblest best. However, I sometimes fear that we are asking him to work overtime. Even an angel may become discouraged for lack of assistance by those whom he desires to assist. At any rate, I wish to make this suggestion: To all our methods for developing individuality, to all our brotherhood movements, to all our social schemes, let us add the simplest, the surest, the most workable force known to man or God. It is the conscious, intelligent, faith-inspired appropriation of that eternal power released from the Godhead by the passing of Christ into the silent kingdoms—the power of the personalizing, socializing Holy Spirit—the cleansing fire that burns out individual dross, the consuming flame that sweeps away social unrighteousness.

I believe Pentecost was the beginning of God's final movement for the completion of the universe. Alfred Russel Wallace tells us that "there are at least three stages in the development of the organic world when some new power or cause must necessarily have come into action." These three stages are represented by the vegetable, the animal, and the human kingdoms. Each kingdom is lifted by direct interference from the eternal world, and each "depends upon different degrees of spiritual influx." The first is thus described: "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth." The second: "And God said, Let the waters swarm with swarms of living creatures, and let fowl fly above the earth on the face of the expanse of the heaven." The third: "The Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, of the already existing materials, and breathed into his nostrils the life of consciousness, and man became a living personality." The fourth and final epoch, the grandest of all, the one for which the universe was preparing untold millions of ages, was ushered in at Pentecost with fiery tongues and harmonious confusion. In that moment was born a new era of spiritual impregnation from the sky behind the sky. From that moment, also, correspondence on earth has always met with abundant response from heaven. And this is Pentecost—heaven's way of bringing perfect self-realization to the individual and the City of God to society. O brethren, go often to the upper room. For that is God's way of bringing you to your best that you may bring your best to your fellow men.

LABOR DAY

By Rev. J. M. Farrar, D.D.*

TWO thousand work horses are walked out for a parade on Memorial Day. This special day is selected so that the thousands of people on the street can see the big, strong, long suffering work horses. Race horses, high steppers and black beauties are not in line. The work horses that do the hard work and pull until they strain a muscle or break the harness, have the right of way. Why do they have this annual parade? The Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Animals believes that when the people see the great number of horses that do our hard work and have not time for high stepping they will have more sympathy. If they have sympathy for the horses they will see that they are better cared for.

THE first Monday after the first Sunday in September is Labor Day. This is a day when the workingmen parade. High steppers, men of leisure, and tramps are not in line. Why do we have Labor Day and a great parade? In order that when we think of the laboring man's long hours and hard work we may have more sympathy for him. Sympathy will tell us to do all we can to make the hours shorter, the pay longer and the burdens lighter. Thirty thousand of our workingmen are killed every year. One immigrant out of every twenty who enters Ellis Island is killed the first year he is in America. Some day we may have a Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Workingmen.

CAN you repeat the Fourth Commandment? "Remember the Sabbath Day to keep it holy." That is, so far, correct. One day for rest—but do not forget the next sentence, the one so many overlook: "Six days shalt thou labor, and do all thy work." This Fourth Commandment tells you to work six days just as clearly as it commands you to rest one day. Are you a laborer? Are you doing something that tires you, makes you feel the need of rest? Then you are obeying the second sentence of the Fourth Commandment.

WE are not all blacksmiths, but we all have a hammer and an anvil. Your school-room is an anvil; your text-book is a hammer, and you are hammering your brain into a good education. Your desk is an anvil; your pen is a hammer, and on paper you are hammering out an examination, an essay or an oration. The intellect sends out sparks, thoughts glow as you weld them together into sentences and paragraphs.

EVERY boy and girl, every man and woman, every one who works, has a hammer and an anvil. The man who digs on the street, the man who sits by the desk, the woman at the wash-tub and the queen on her throne, each one has a hammer and an anvil. Labor Day teaches us to respect and protect every person who works.

"Six days shalt thou labor." Are you a worker? Have you a hammer and an anvil? Have you a place in the parade on Labor Day? Why do you bend your finger like an interrogation point? Asking for a story? Very well, you shall have a story written by R. E. Wakefield:

I HAD a class but didn't really know what manner of girls they were, but our Sunday School picnic gave me a splendid chance to investigate.

After a fine lunch on the green grass I drew my class aside and proceeded to find out, as deftly as I might, what kind of material I was supposed to work up into good womanhood. Molly Baxter, who was apparently the class spokeswoman, suggested that each girl report to me on her specialty—what she could do best.

"You'll know then what we are good for," she said with a laugh. You may be sure I stepped briskly into the chance and Molly led off.

"I'm good for the fastest typewriting in town," she said gaily.

"And I'm good for keeping books."

"And I'm good for practising three hours a day."

At this point there was a lull in the proceedings. Apparently the shyer girls were thinking about their talents and what their work was. Finally Bertha Wilson said: "I can make my own dresses."

Annie Brown was the next girl to report: "I make the bread and pies and cake for our family, and mother says I'm not such a bad little cook," she said modestly. And then Grace Kitchen spoke up bravely. "I don't know that I've any talent, unless it's minding the children and darning the family stockings."

This left only a queer, stunted-looking home girl whom I had entered in my new class book as "Martha Jones." "Well, Martha," I said, "what can you do? I know you can do something special." Then careless, outspoken Molly Baxter said: "Oh, I guess Martha's only good for scrubbing."

My first thought was one of indignation at Molly's slurring tones, but quickly I saw my chance. I told them it would be a mighty queer world if nobody was willing to scrub; that we couldn't get along with just stenographers and music people; that we really must have scrubbers.

In Lowell's verse let us change the word man to Junior:

> No Junior is born into the world whose work
> Is not born with him; there is always work,
> And tools to work withal, for those who will;
> The Junior who stands with arms akimbo set,
> Until occasion tells him what to do,
> And he who waits to have his task marked out,
> Shall die and leave his mission unfulfilled.

Deaconess Alice

By Lucy Rider Meyer

YOUR readers will remember the work of this brave young woman in Arizona, which was recently described in these columns. She cares for the poor victims of the great White Plague who flock to that climate. The letter below, just received, tells a little of her work:

"I wish you could see this town with its hotels and boarding houses and the many tiny tents just pitched out in its bare fields, in which so many of the poor sick find a shelter. They are just big enough for one person. In two of these tents standing close together, I found one day two boys, both very sick. In one tent there was a cot, a tiny stove, a box for a chair, a tin can or two for cooking, and a cup and spoon. The cot was only canvas and having very little cover the poor lad had been suffering from the cold. A friend who went with me bought some cheap cloth, hastily ran up a bed-tick and had it filled with excelsior. The boy was so grateful! Then I began to tell him about Jesus.

"The other tent of the two had no cot, and its occupant, Albert, was lying on the floor. These boys were all alone, not a friend or acquaintance within thousands of miles—except that they had become a little acquainted with each other, of course, because their tents happened to be so close together. Albert's temperature was 103 and his pulse was fast and weak. Yet he was trying to live on canned goods.

"'Albert,' I said, 'do you know you are a very sick boy?'

"'Oh, I will be better to-morrow,' he replied. They're always so hopeful.

"I tried to turn his thoughts toward the better country, for I saw he was going. He seemed glad to have me pray with him. I often wish I could just stay and spend my whole time with a single one of these poor, needy ones, but there are so many of them! Later we carried the boys some oysters and milk and other comforts bought by money which a friend had sent me especially for delicacies for the sick. They both grew steadily worse. Then one time as I drew near I saw the little tent which had been occupied by the other boy thrown wide open and empty. Poor Albert in his tent sat shivering over a tiny fire—he was having a chill. I called out cheerily:

"'Why, where's Luke?'

The poor frightened lad looked up so pitifully:

"'Oh, don't you know? He's dead!'

"Think of this dreadful experience for the boy! And himself so sick, too.

"I stayed with Albert quite a while that day, making his tent as comfortable as I could and getting his dinner. Perhaps I didn't do it according to all the rules of the cooking schools—I had only a tin can in which to make his oyster stew—but he said it tasted good. Then I persuaded him to give up and go to bed, and I tried to do for him what his mother would have done—tucking him in. Then I prayed with him and at the close of my prayer I said, 'Albert, won't you pray for yourself?' I wish you could have heard him. I knew he must have prayed a great deal in his heart during the long lonely hours, or he never could have prayed aloud as he did. He told the Lord how much he wanted to get well, but how tired he was; that he wanted to be good and then at last that he was 'trusting all to Jesus.' Then he began praying for his father in the East that he might be saved, too. When he finished his face was fairly shining. The dear boy died a little later.

"But you must not think the people always die. I have told you about the sad cases, but there are others—oh, many of them!—that get well, and to whom I wave goodby as they leave on the train. There are beautiful stories about them, too."

THE ANGEL OF THE BATTLEFIELD

Nursing the Injured in a Military Hospital

Succoring Wounded Soldiers in the Crimea

(From illustrations published half a century ago)

By KATE UPSON CLARK

IT has been a source of pleasure to the whole civilized world that the life of Florence Nightingale, born May 12, 1820, was prolonged to our day. She passed away on August 14. Millions more have been privileged to call themselves her contemporaries than if she had died from the terrible illness which prostrated her just after her great work in the Crimea. The world has seemed to be ennobled by her very presence, and a certain glory of our planet seems to have departed with her.

Florence Nightingale was born at Florence, Italy, and was named for her birthplace. Her father was an English gentleman, whose rightful name was William Edward Shore, but who had assumed that of a great-uncle, Peter Nightingale, whose estates descended to him on that condition. In his beautiful homes at Embley Park, Hampshire, and Lea Hurst, Derbyshire, his two children, Florence and her sister, who afterward became Lady Verney, passed their childhood. Mr. Nightingale had advanced views regarding the education of girls, and himself superintended the studies of his daughters. They became skilled in mathematics, the classics and the sciences, and were especially instructed in the modern languages. These were most useful in Florence Nightingale's later experience.

It was observed that the many books upon medicine and nursing in her father's library were those which seemed most to attract her, and though she was an expert musician and needlewoman, and possessed all the social graces, she was interested above everything in the care of the sick and the management of hospitals.

When she was taken up to London at the age of eighteen to be presented at court, she met Elizabeth Fry, the consecrated prison reformer. From that time, she resolved to devote herself to the service of the sick and suffering. The Nightingale family went abroad the next year, but while the others went in pursuit of pleasure, Florence employed her time in visiting hospitals and asylums. She spent nine years visiting and working in the nursing sisterhoods of the Continental cities.

In 1851 she enrolled herself as a voluntary nurse at Kaiserworth in Germany. Later, she studied at a Paris hospital. Here her health broke down and she returned home to Lea Hurst. When she recovered, she was asked to reorganize a greatly demoralized London hospital for women. In accomplishing this work, she displayed masterly ability.

For forty years before the outbreak of the Crimean War, England had been at peace with all the world. Her long immunity had led to inevitable unreadiness in handling the details of army management. Before her men had been many weeks at the front, frightful rumors reached London of the diseases which were carrying them off. England was sending supplies, but men were dying for lack of them, while official fingers were untying bungling red tape. Sidney Herbert, Minister of War, who with his wife had long known Florence Nightingale, wrote asking her to go out and "take charge of everything." Her letter offering her services crossed his. November 5, the day of the battle of Inkermann, Florence Nightingale and her nurses, thirty-seven in number, landed at Scutari. There were two miles of sick-beds; wards were rank with fever and cholera and the odor of undressed wounds. Into what Russell calls "this great temple of pain and foulness," moved the slight and delicate form of the English lady and her company of nurses. Kitchens were established, and intelligent routine took the place of the bungling red tape.

But all this was not accomplished without much of that friction which has ever accompanied the entrance of woman into new and wider fields of activity. Miss Nightingale had a terrible struggle. Surgeons and officers fought her every effort, but with the courage of a lion she fought back and held her own.

All of her tact, energy and firmness were called into continual requisition. From her arrival she allowed no routine or red tape to stand in the way of procuring the needed supplies for suffering men. If there were no officer at hand with authority to unlock a storehouse she took with her a few Turks and stood by while they broke it open. Her organizing and executive ability were everywhere manifest. She brought comfort, succor, rest into the wards; she established laundries and kitchens for the hospitals, and herself found time to superintend them and their workers. She organized the work of the nurses and their assistants and had surgical appliances prepared and ready to meet emergencies. All day long and far into the night her work continued.

In company with the army chaplains she established a library and schoolroom, and she had evening lectures to amuse the convalescent men. She attended to the correspondence of the wounded soldiers, and in short was what the soldiers christened her, the "Angel of the Crimea."

Florence Nightingale found the death rate in the Barrack Hospital, at Scutari, sixty per cent., and left it a fraction over one. No wonder the men and women of England were ready to give her a royal welcome. Her Queen conferred a decoration upon her; the nation gave her a testimonial of £50,000. With the latter she founded the Nightingale Home for the training of nurses, which is to-day a notable feature of St. Thomas' Hospital, that great refuge of the sick, which stands on the Thames embankment, opposite the Houses of Parliament. It was Florence Nightingale who raised sick-nursing to t dignity of a profession for women. "To Flore Nightingale, who was my own first teacher and spirer," wrote a distinguished lady who had nur in half the hospitals of Europe, "modern nursi owes its first impulse. When I first began my h pital training, hospital nursing was thought to a profession which no decent woman of rank co follow. If even a servant turned nurse, it reflec upon her character."

MacDonald drew this picture of her as she w about her work in the great Scutari Hospital: " her slender form glides quietly along each corrid every poor fellow's face softens with gratitude sight of her. When all the medical officers ha retired for the night, and silence and darkness ha settled down upon the miles of prostrate sick, s may be observed alone, with a little lamp in l hand, making her solitary rounds." There w miles of beds, thousands of sick men; she could r reach each one in a single round, but, said one p fellow, "We could kiss her shadow as she passe

Such tributes as this suggested the most beau ful of all that the poets have paid Miss Nightingal —"Santa Filomena," by our own Longfellow which, in turn, inspired the hand of the sculpt who modeled the exquisite statuette of Miss Nigh ingale, which found a place of honor in the Nigh ingale Home. Perhaps no American sees t without recalling the words:

> A Lady with a Lamp shall stand
> In the great history of the land,
> A noble type of good,
> Heroic womanhood.

The latter years of this wonderful woman's l were passed in semi-invalidism and retirement. S grew to be very stout, but her fine, open face, wi its frame of gray hair, retained its nobility to t last, though for many years she had not known moment without pain.

Florence Nightingale was the second woman to presented with the freedom of the city of Lond the first having been the Baroness Burdett Cout the famous philanthropist. The Sultan of Turk made her a magnificent present in recognition her kindness to Turkish soldiers. She was made member of the distinguished Order of Merit f British subjects who have done great work in t naval or military service. Many other honors ha been conferred upon her.

She was the author of several books and mag zine articles, all of them bearing upon phases her chosen profession.

The United States sent her a testimonial for h advice upon improving our hospital service at t time of our Civil War. Similar testimonials ha come to her from France and from individuals a over the world. The famous Geneva Conventi was the direct and logical fruit of her labors in t East, and now its red cross, gleaming on every ba tlefield, is in a sense a monument to her genius.

The end came to her naturally and peacefull She had been very ill, but was thought to be i proving. On August 12, she was very cheerful, b during that night alarming symptoms develope She sank gradually until two o'clock Sunday afte noon, when her heart at last stopped beating. S had begged that her funeral might be quiet.

Thus modestly died this most womanly of wome as she had lived, unselfish, retiring, and anxiou not for fame, but only to do good. It is impossib to exaggerate the effect of her masterly achiev ments. She not only accomplished a specific wo in a manner unapproached before by man woman; but she raised all womanhood to a high level, and challenged for it a new respect and adm ration.

How the President Spends Vacation

PRESIDENT TAFT is enjoying this season his first prolonged vacation. He feels that he has earned a season of rest by the period of strenuous activity which he put in at the White House during the spring. He was especially burdened during the latter part of the last session of the national legislature and it required much "missionary work" on his part to induce Congress to pass some of the legislative measures to which he stood committed. In consequence, the President found it necessary to work from eleven to fifteen hours daily during those "witching days" of springtime, when nature was insistently calling him out of doors.

President Taft is a believer in a good long annual vacation. He has said so many times in private conversation, and only a few weeks ago, he publicly proclaimed it in an address delivered to the townspeople at Bar Harbor, Me. He remarked that his father had considered two weeks' vacation each year ample, but that conditions as well as times had changed since his father's day, and that he deemed two months out of the twelve none too great a proportion to devote to rest and out-door life amid a change of scene.

The President consistently practises what he preaches in the matter of vacation doctrine. Almost from the time when, as a comparatively young man, he took his seat upon the judicial bench, it was his custom to take a prolonged vacation each summer, and for sixteen years he and the members of his family took up their abode for several months annually at the little resort of Murray Bay, Canada, on the north bank of the St. Lawrence River. Indeed, it may be suspected that the Tafts would be making an annual pilgrimage thither to this day—as the children of the family do—were it not for the stipulation that the President of the United States must not journey beyond the borders of the country.

The cottage at Beverly, Mass., is now the summer home of the Taft family. It was leased early in the spring of 1909 with that end in view; but then came the special session of Congress to revise the tariff, and the lawmakers were so slow about getting the new law into shape, that it was well into August before the President could leave Washington. The President's birthday anniversary on September 15 found him started on the extended tour of the country, which had been planned long in advance, and which carried him across the continent and back again. This year, however, his vacation programme has had a more satisfactory realization. Congress tarried at its work at the Capitol somewhat longer than had been anticipated, but the Chief Executive was able to begin his outing early in July, and as he plans to continue his occupancy of the "summer White House" until about the middle of October, he will have a good long spell in which to store up health and strength for the coming winter's work. Besides, the sea air seems to be the best of tonics for Mrs. Taft. Since she suffered a nervous collapse a few months after taking up her abode at the White House, her health has been a matter of concern to the President, and he is loath to have her leave any environment that proves beneficial.

Few interruptions have been permitted to disturb his summer programme. He is one of the best-natured of men and is easily persuaded in the matter of accepting invitations extended by individuals, organizations and municipalities. He was so deluged with invitations of this sort for the summer and autumn that his new secretary, Mr. Charles D. Norton, awoke to the fact that if they were accepted the President's vacation would be monopolized by an endless series of journeyings, short and long, to county fairs, picnics, reunions, encampments, conventions, monument dedications and other public events. Friends argued with the amiable vacationist and the upshot of the matter was that all but a very few of the Presidential acceptances were canceled.

Of course, it can readily be understood that no man, while serving as ruler of the nation, can hope to enjoy an extended interval of absolute repose. The President must always mix duty and pleasure. When Mr. Taft transfers his abode to the rocky point jutting out into Massachusetts Bay, he takes with him a big share of the White House business staff. These secretaries, clerks, stenographers, telegraphers and messengers set up, in a building not far from the President's cottage, an improvised business establishment that is a very fair imitation of the executive office at Washington. If there is a day when the President does not care to go to the office building, the mail, or at least all the more important communications, are conveyed to him at his cottage by messenger; but there is seldom a day that he can get wholly away from business cares. He did try the experiment, this season, of setting certain days apart wholly for relaxation; the scheme scarcely worked out as had been planned. Urgent matters of official routine demanded attention, and there was a sudden abandonment of the plan to make the President temporarily a recluse. Later, there was evolved a plan whereby he was to receive visitors only three days each week; but this was found impracticable. He has, however, managed to reserve a couple of hours immediately after breakfast each morning for his favorite game of golf; but that is about as much play-time as he has been sure of on any day.

His most complete freedom from official cares was during the ten-day cruise in the yacht Mayflower. The President delights in the joys of yachting. Not only does the President wear, on such occasions, the regulation yachting togs, cap and all, but he is becoming so good a sailor that he has planned another sea trip—to the Panama Canal and return—for the late autumn of this year.

The Taft vacation home—the big shingle house with its tinting of gray—is not remarkable architecturally, but it is roomy and comfortable and looks out upon the ocean, over a beautiful lawn adorned with bits of sculpture—among the number a very artistic marble fountain brought from a Roman palace and installed this year by Mrs. Evans, who owns the cottage and the estate adjoining. The President's family have their own private bathing beach only a stone's throw from the house, and a stable that has been converted into a garage that shelters half a dozen automobiles, including one for the use of the Secret Service men who always accompany the President wherever he goes.

AMONG THE WORKERS AT HOME AND ABROAD

—THE RECENT ARTICLE on "The Rauhe Haus" in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, was prepared by T. Wettstein from the papers of Frances Wettstein, principal of the School for the Deaf at Milwaukee, Wis.

—REV. GEORGE HOUSE, of West Orange, N. J., has spent his vacation week at the bench in the shops of the Edison Company for the purpose of learning the assembling and demonstrating of the kinetoscope for use in church services.

—ONE OF THE YOUNGEST preachers is Carey Burgeon Osborne, of Upper Alton, Ill., who preached his first sermon before he was sixteen. He has now been preaching over two years, and those who have heard him say the young Illinoisan gives promise of becoming a very effective revivalist or pastor. He is a pastor now.

—ON AUGUST 15, Rev. J. E. Rutledge and wife of Cameron, Mo., celebrated their golden wedding anniversary at Willard Hall, Chautauqua Park, Waterloo, Ia. Mr. Rutledge is a superannuated member of the Missouri Conference, Methodist Episcopal Church. He was born in Virginia, January 26, 1834. When a lad he was converted. He was educated at the Illinois Wesleyan University and at Garrett Biblical Institute. In 1858 he received his first appointment. The following year he was married to Miss Emma A. Miller, of Henderson. Mr. Rutledge was ordained deacon in 1860 and two years later was ordained elder. Mr. and Mrs. Rutledge are now in the seventy-seventh year of their age, having spent twenty-five years in the regular work of the ministry in the Central Illinois Conference, five years in the Iowa Conference, and ten years in the Missouri Conference, an even forty years of active service.

—CONEY ISLAND affords probably the greatest opportunity in America to reach the masses with the Gospel. One million people visit it weekly during the summer months. It is home, foreign and city mission work combined. For the last eight seasons, the City Mission Society has carried on open-air evangelistic meetings on the sands. Last season 200,000 people of thirty-one nationalities and thirty-seven States heard the Gospel at a cost of less than one cent per person. Twenty-five per cent. were Jews. Three hundred and thirty-two people were hopefully converted, 310 were helped with food and shelter. The 1910 season opened May 28, preaching daily from 5 to 7 P.M. Means are needed to carry on the work. All letters should be addressed to Frank H. Parsons, treasurer, 215 Montague Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

—REPRESENTATIVE MEN of different denominations have recently met at Winona Lake, Ind., and formed an organization known as the Winona National Federated Evangelistic Committee. The plan is to secure the co-operation of all denominations in the work of evangelism throughout the country. Rev. William Edward Biederwolf, D.D., has been chosen as General Secretary and Director. The committee is planning for a number of State-wide simultaneous campaigns.

—LESS THAN two years ago, the Family Altar League was founded by Dr. Biederwolf, the well-known evangelist, and a few of his associates. In an incredibly short time the movement has become world-wide. Up to the present time, about 85,000 requests have come in for covenant cards, and letters are pouring in daily to the main office asking for information. These letters are from all parts of the world. The work of the League is being carried on actively in China, and it is expected that in a very short time it will be circulated in the other Foreign Mission fields. The various ecclesiastical organizations of this country and Canada are taking it up. The League has no organizations, no meetings, and no fees. It is simply a world-wide company of people who have taken the same vows and are seeking the same blessing. Pastors and others interested can obtain full information by addressing The Family Altar League, 602 Lakeside Building, Chicago, Ill.

—IN THE UPPER part of the Bronx Borough, New York, is a locality where mission work has been carried on since 1890. This work has spread down as far as Chinatown. Girls have been reclaimed, families united and helped, needy ones have been cared for, hospitals and prisons have been visited, literature has been distributed. Rev. W. H. Collinson and his associates who conduct this worthy work will be glad of any aid sent to 728 East Two Hundred and Twenty-second Street, New York City.

The Honor of Washington

AFTER the Revolution, Congress voted to Washington a statue and a large sum of money. He at once declared that he would not accept a single cent. They reminded him that he had served eight and a half years without pay, and plead earnestly to win his consent, but in vain. Then the sum which had been voted was invested by order of Congress in some government undertaking in Washington's name, and he was told, after the deeds were made out, that now it was too late to refuse—he would simply have to accept it. But he still refused inexorably. It was a gift, but he felt it to be like a bribe. The whole nation seemed in a conspiracy to heap riches upon him; but it could not be done without his consent, and he said "No" to the last. He may have acted unwisely, according to the modern view, which is unfortunately more commercial than patriotic; but he won the nation's undying respect and admiration for his determination not to make money out of his official position. His attitude is in the sharpest contrast to that of some of the legislators and officials of these days, who are keenly alive to the opportunities that arise to enrich themselves secretly. With Congress and several of our State legislatures investigating wholesale bribery charges and other forms of official corruption, we are reminded of the fact that we have fallen on degenerate days, as far as the standard of public honor and official integrity is concerned.

A Friend of the Republic

WHEN Pedro Montt, President of the Chilean Republic, stood by the side of Mayor Gaynor of New York, on the deck of the ocean liner at Hoboken, on August 9, no one then present could have divined the tragedy that was shortly to come into both lives. Mayor Gaynor, stricken down by a murderous attack, still lives, while President Montt, prostrated by the shock of the incident, is dead of heart disease. He was an invalid and the scene he had witnessed precipitated an acute seizure from which he passed away on August 16, shortly after his arrival at Bremen. For many years he had been a foremost figure in South American politics. His friendship for this country was shown in the earnest and capable manner in which he aided us in the effort to harmonize discordant elements in the Southern republics and to avert war. He had a long and honorable public career, and had successively served his country as representative in the Chilean Assembly, as Senator, as Premier, as Minister to Washington and as President. He held advanced views on public questions, was a consistent advocate of sound financial policies, liberal in his attitude toward religion, a friend of peace and moderation. It has been charged that his administration was an extravagant one, but this is probably best explained by the admitted fact that it was an administration of much railroad building and general improvement and progress. To Americans who knew him, he will always be remembered as the kindly, gracious, dignified statesman, who had an ardent admiration for this Republic, to which he loved to give expression, and which helped to make him a very welcome guest when he visited us.

The Courts and the Bible

IN the famous case before the Illinois Supreme Court which resulted in the exclusion of the Bible from the public schools of that State, the two judges who dissented from the majority, in handing up their opinion, made a very notable presentation of the constitutional aspect of the question. They showed that the Supreme Courts of Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Iowa, Kentucky, Kansas and Texas in recorded cases have each held that the Bible in its entirety is non-sectarian, and that no part of it could be excluded from the public schools on constitutional grounds. The Supreme Courts of all the States except Wisconsin and Nebraska held that the reading of the Bible in public schools is not prohibited by constitutional enactment. The Wisconsin and Nebraska Courts held that only portions may be excluded. The majority opinion of the Illinois Supreme Court (the minority of that court asserts) does not cite a single case which sustains its position, nor can any supporting precedent be found. On the contrary, the majority opinion is in conflict with the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and the Supreme Courts of all the States already named above and also of Ohio, and with all previous decisions on the subject.

The minority opinion, which is both able and convincing and should be read everywhere, will appear in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD next week. It would seem to afford an excellent basis for an appeal to the United States Supreme Court. There should be, and doubtless there will be, a reaction in Illinois. Sectarian teaching should be barred from the public schools, but these schools should be free and open to the use of the Bible as the one book that gives the best foundation for the upbuilding of character and the cultivation of those qualities that go toward making the best citizenship. Principals and teachers who offend by sectarian teaching should be dealt with by the local school boards. If the citizens of Illinois should decide to take the matter up to the highest court, they might win a great triumph, not only for their own State, but for the whole people. What is needed is a free Bible and absolute freedom to use it in the schools, not under compulsion, but by choice.

Soldiers as Fire-fighters

WHEN President Taft proposed that our American soldiers be sent to fight the great forest fires in the Northwest, he did that which won the hearty approval of the nation. Certainly, there could be no better service, in a time of peace, for the boys in blue, than to aid in saving life and property. Troops were hurried from different posts to the blazing woods in Idaho, Montana and Washington, where they are doing effective work. These conflagrations, which were threatening the existence of many towns and villages, had gone beyond the control of the citizens, and had it not been for the timely aid rendered by General Wood's brave boys, we might ere now have had to chronicle widespread disaster. Fighting fire is a task more in accordance with civilized ideas than fighting our fellowmen. It approaches more closely the ideal service proposed by Professor William James as a substitute for war. He advocates an army enlisted "against nature," to work the mines, build railroads and tunnels, work in foundries, and perform man's work in various other ways, as a means of preserving the physique and keeping up "the hardihood of the nation." There is probably none of these labors he mentions that will do this in as large a measure as putting men in the bucket-and-hose line in the face of a roaring, terrifying, forest conflagration.

"The Lady with the Lamp"

SUCH was the loving title by which gentle Florence Nightingale was known in England and France and over half the civilized world—a title earned by her heroic devotion to the wounded soldiers of the Crimean and other campaigns. This world of ours, so full of sickness and suffering and bitter privation, is made richer and better by its Queens of Mercy. Florence Nightingale found her highest happiness in lowly service rendered to those who could never repay that service save in love and gratitude. From her noble example there has arisen a great army of such sweet ministers of mercy. Every country now has its Red Cross, in which woman plays a conspicuous part, and to hospitals and sickrooms they bring skill and sympathy and an atmosphere of comfort and blessing. When the late Dr. Talmage, former editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, visited Miss Nightingale eleven years ago in England, he gave this vivid picture of the heroine:

> Her conversation had the sprightliness of a girl, but her countenance had in it the illumination of a long life occupied in helping others. Her features were sympathy enthroned. There was something in her appearance almost supernatural. It is impossible to exercise the highest style of charities for a half century and that fact not be emblazoned on forehead and cheek. She told us of much that she had seen when there were no hospitals at all, and the wounded lay uncovered upon the battlefield. I said to her, "You found that there was no poetry in war," and she responded, "Yes, but I found poetry in the behavior of men under their pains, and in their sympathy for others who were in pain." I asked her if it was not an awful pull on one's nerves to stand amid so many physical agonies. She said, "We had no time to think of ourselves. There were the gashes to be bound up, and the broken bones to be set, and the dead t buried, and we forgot our own fatigues and discomforts." reply to a question, she said, "I never knew what it was t really happy until I undertook the work of relief, and l never known an unhappy day since I accepted my missi Her head and heart are full of projects of alleviation. Wh pity that such a woman will ever have to die as long as world has sufferings to soothe! Her house is an unpreten house, and on an unpretending street, but a ladder brigh that which filled Jacob's dream is let down to that place n by night, and angels of God descend it, their wings loaded benedictions.

Surely there is a throne in heaven for such woman and for all who, like her, spend their li for others, facing danger and death for the sake Christ and humanity.

General Notes

—CHOLERA, SAID TO be of the true Asiatic type, has been ra in Russia for some time past and has lately appeared in sev provinces of Italy. Our immigration authorities will nee exercise extreme vigilance to prevent the disease being car to our ports, which, in view of our large Italian immigratio not unlikely to happen.

—TEMPERANCE HAS done much for Kansas and is a l contributor to its present remarkable prosperity. Says on the Kansas County Commissioners: "This State has no more for a poor-farm than a hog has for a hip-pocket." The Kan Agricultural College has taken over a number of these p farms for experiment stations.

—CROSS-CHANNEL AVIATION is no longer a novelty in Eur John B. Moissant, an American, flew from Paris to Lon in a Bleriot aeroplane, with a machinist as fellow-passenger an effort to win a $20,000 prize. He was almost wrecked i storm of wind and rain while crossing the channel, and was fin obliged by an accident to descend when within twenty miles London.

—OHIO'S STREET CAR strike has elements of peculiar interest, account of the police of Columbus refusing to protect the c against the strikers. Many policemen have resigned from service rather than take sides against the unionists. Riots h occurred and the police of other cities have been called to as in restoring order. It is a critical situation and unless so compromise is reached soon it may become even more serious

—THERE IS A VERY natural feeling of disappointment am the equal suffragists in Great Britain over the "shelving" of Woman's Franchise Bill. Of course, it may come up again may even be passed, but it was certainly a strange and ina picious circumstance that the Shackleton Bill conferring franchise on women should have received a very decided vote approval by being passed to a second reading, and almost in next breath the same body of Commoners should have sent back to a committee of the whole.

—THE SECRET OF long life is and always has been an attract theme. Here are two veterans who speak about it from ex rience. "Fresh air, exercise and absence of worry" is the rec of ninety-three-year-old Nathaniel Baldwin of Montclair, N. "The simple life, out-of-doors as much as possible" is the w 102-year-old Margaret Van Rensselaer of Saratoga, N. Y., p it. Reduced to the last residuum, a clear conscience, a cheer heart and trust in God will carry a man or woman along to t limit of life better than anything else we know of.

Alfonso Steering His Yacht

THE young King of Spain is splendidly developed every way. The greatest care has been given to his education. He is a diligent student and has pursued a wide range of literary and scientific investigation. He has not neglected his body, but has proven himself an athlete in many departments of sport. He is fond of riding and hunting and is a splendid yachtsman. He has the highest integrity and determined ambition to lift up and bless the nation of which he is the head. He is ambitious for its military, marine, social, moral and religious progress. He is a man of singular personal bravery, and it is a fortunate thing that the Spanish nation, at this critical time of its history, has as its ruler a man of his physical, mental and moral stamina. And as he is an expert in sailing his yacht over the water, it looks now as though he would be able to drive his ship of state through the waves of tumult and revolution, and bring it safely into the harbor of national liberty and prosperity. In the sailing of ships over material waters, or over the turbulent waves of political conflict, the helm and the man at the helm have much to do in determining the ship's progress and destiny.

Behold also the ships, which though they be so great, and are driven of fierce winds, yet are they turned about with a very small helm, whithersoever the governor listeth. (James 3:4.)

Dyed His Beard Blue

Morris Lukowsky, who is seventy years of age, landed at New York from Libau, Russia. He was detained at Ellis Island because he was thought to be too old to earn his living by work and because he had no money with which to support himself. The other day it was noticed that the old man with the long white beard had disappeared and in his stead there was a somewhat younger looking man with a blue beard. But the hair that cropped out from under his cap was white. It was Lukowsky, but in his determination to appear young and remain in this country, he had found up an indelible pencil which he thought would make his beard black. He did not have enough of the stuff to color his hair, so the man found himself with a blue beard and white head. The authorities, under the law, were compelled to send him back to his home in Russia. The old immigrant had a motive in looking younger than he really was. He wanted to stay in this, God's country of liberty and opportunity, but his attempt to disguise himself made him appear ridiculous, and resulted in failure. Many people resort to devices giving them a youthful appearance. Some of them are rendered about as ridiculous as the old man with the blue beard and the white hair; their arts are almost as unsuccessful as that of the immigrant who had to be returned to his home. Age, after a useful life and with the becoming spirit, is just as beautiful as youth, and the sunset of life may be as magnificent as the dawn. The divine penman has made mention of gray hairs as one of the symbols of the beauty of old age:

And the beauty of old men is the gray head. (Prov. 20:29.)

Floods in Japan

Tokyo, the capital of Japan, is situated on the island of Hondo, and on both sides of the Sumida River. The waters of the Sumida River overflowed the banks, causing a most disastrous flood. Two wards of the city were almost entirely submerged, and the farms in the river district have been inundated, and the damage to the rice crop that has resulted is estimated at $4,500,000. Mr. O'Brien, the American Ambassador at Tokyo, reported to the State Department at Washington that the city of Tokyo was supporing one hundred thousand refugees from the flooded districts of Japan, and that one hundred and fifty thousand houses had been damaged by the waters. Three hundred and eighty-five persons have been killed and five hundred more are missing. The victims of the floods are wholly dependent upon public relief. Every available boat is being employed in the work of rescue and conveying food to the starving. Tokyo is a beautiful city, with its handsome buildings, its exquisitely beautiful parks, its gorgeous flower gardens, its street cars, electric lights, and other evidences of modern civilization, and its people are intelligent, industrious and upright. Japan's misfortune is the sorrow of the world, so nearly has God made his children akin and so well nigh universally has he spread his gospel of brotherly love. If the damage of the floods should continue and the government be unable to render the instant relief necessary, Christian nations and individuals are ready, as they always have been, to aid in furnishing shelter for the homeless and food for the hungry. Practical benevolence is not only commanded by our Christianity, but is one of the necessary expressions of its life:

But whoso hath this world's good, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him? (I. John 3:17.)

Got a Trip to Italy

It will be remembered that Robert Taft, the President's son, while driving an automobile at Beverly, Mass., ran over Michael Angelo de Gregordio, an Italian laborer, and injured him. The man was taken to the Beverly Hospital, where the President paid all the bills. The man was discharged the other day from the hospital as cured. Although the Massachusetts Highway Commission had exonerated young Taft from blame, the President decided to send De Gregordio on a visit back to his home in Italy, hoping that the trip would entirely restore his vigor. In addition to paying for his passage, Mr. Taft gave him $500, more than a year's earnings, besides pocket money for incidental expenses. The man on receiving the money rushed to the nearest post office and sent it home to his people in Italy. This spirit of justice and brotherly love manifested by the President of the United States is a healthful example to the millions of our people. The difference between running down an individual with the automobile on the highway, producing injury or death, and then speeding away to hide the number of the car or identity of the owner, and this truly honorable and tender action of the President, is great, and suggests a difference between the treatment of the wounded by the priest and Levite and by the Samaritan.

And he went to him, and bound up his wounds, pouring in oil and wine, and set him on his own beast, and brought him to an inn, and took care of him. And on the morrow when he departed, he took two pence, and gave them to the host, and said unto him, Take care of him; and whatsoever thou spendest more, when I come again, I will repay thee. (Luke 10:34, 35.)

King Alfonso× of Spain as a Yachtsman

Strange Habitation of a Snake

A few days ago, a young lady in Richmond, Va., while resting in a hammock in her garden took the "rat" out of her hair in order to cool and rest her head. She laid it carelessly down beside her, and thought no more about it. The next day she felt strange pains in her head. They grew so severe that she was compelled to leave her place of employment and go home. She took down her hair and found great swollen places on her scalp. Her mother, who was trying to assist her in easing her pain, happened to pick up the "rat" the girl had just removed, and feeling something hard in it, she began pulling it apart. Great was her horror to find a six-inch moccasin nestled in the centre of the hair. It had worked its way in the day before when the young lady had put it on the ground. Danger, physical and moral, lurks in unseen places. The serpent of sin creeps into every unexpected place to do his victim damage. Satan's subtlety is mentioned in the introduction to the story of the temptation in the garden:

Now the serpent was more subtle than any beast of the field which the Lord God had made. (Gen. 3:1.)

Edward Payson Hammond Dead

The Rev. Edward Payson Hammond, the world-famed evangelist, died at Hartford, Conn., on Sunday, August 14. He graduated at Williams College in 1858, took a theological course at the Union Seminary, and then attended the Free Church College at Edinburgh, Scotland. He began evangelistic work there with success and then came to America and swept every portion of this country with his revival meetings from Maine to California and from the Lakes to the Gulf. He was ordained by the Presbytery of New York, and held revival services as an ordained minister. Thousands of people were often converted in cities during one series of meetings. It was his universal custom to begin his evangelistic services in communities by calling the children together and winning them to the Cross by his simple messages and charming music. In his children's talks he used a magnetized tack hammer which would not pick up a large piece of steel, but which would gather about itself any number of tacks, to show how much easier it was for children to be drawn to Christ, than people when they get old. Mr. Hammond had the faculty of setting everybody to work in his meetings, so that every Christian in his revival services was pushed by his personality to talk and pray with some one else. He was a copious writer and must have written as many as fifty little books. There are no scales in which can be weighed the influence of such a man upon the heart and destiny of the individual and the Church. He certainly was obedient to the call of his Master to go preach the Gospel. Of Mr. Hammond it can be said, what was said of a greater preacher than he:

Through mighty signs and wonders, by the power of the Spirit of God; so that from Jerusalem, and round about unto Illyricum, I have fully preached the Gospel of Christ. (Rom. 15:19.)

Abominable Treatment of Mother

Annella Januar, a laborer, twenty-six years old, was locked up in one of the police stations of Brooklyn on the charge of throwing acid in the eyes of his mother, Mrs. Rosina Januar, a widow fifty years of age, and of stealing her money, which she had saved by hard work for several years. According to the story told by Mrs. Januar, she was alone in her apartments preparing a meal, when her son, who also lives in the same house, entered. He had a small bottle of acid in his hands, she says, and threw the contents into her face. Taking a rag he rubbed more of the fluid on her face and eyes. Finally, while she was screaming with pain and crying for help, she alleges that he procured a sharp knife, and cut her skirts almost to pieces in his attempt to find a bag which contained $1,000, which she had sewed in her clothing. Getting the bag with the money he left the house and closed the door. This $1,000 the woman saved by washing. It seems that her son, who has a wife and two children, had determined to go back to Italy, and it is charged that he did this dastardly act to get the money before he went. It is hard to conceive of a deeper dye of filial disloyalty than this disfigurement of a mother for life by her own son, and this taking of the money she had laid up by hard work for a rainy day. This incident is in marked contrast to the many sons and daughters who, in recognition of the love and service of parents, care for them most tenderly, anticipating their every want, and scattering their pathway with flowers; but it reminds us of some who forget the love and service of father and mother, and who are cold, neglectful and even brutal in their conduct toward them, and nothing is more unseemly or unchristian than this treatment of parents. The Saviour himself said:

For God commanded, saying, Honor thy father and mother: and, He that curseth father or mother, let him die the death. (Matt. 15:4.)

Here the Will of the People Wins

Fifth Article of the Series on Our Country, Its Laws and Its People

By E. R. JOHNSTONE

HERETOFORE the contentions of this series have not been open to general contradiction. It is universally conceded that America has the best Constitution the world has ever known, and that in this country above all others the processes of assimilation of foreign immigrants show most worthy fruit. It is also incontestably true that, looking on our country's darker side, we suffer inconceivably from the law's delays and misapplications, and that we do not punish properly or generally official wrongdoing.

Concerning the present assertion, "Here (in America) the Will of the People Wins," I am well aware there is honest doubt. Each of us has known occasions when it seemed as if the will of the people was ignored, belittled, or defeated, and this, too, when such will was manifestly for the betterment of human conditions and national life. At times, doubtless, hundreds of thousands of good American men and women have felt like echoing Holland in Bitter-Sweet and crying:

> The sun has gone out and the stars are dead:
> God has forgotten the world!

However, I contend, with great faith, that from such mental Gethsemanes we emerge, or should emerge, into better, brighter beliefs, and can substitute for the despairing cry of the couplet above, the hopeful words of the world's greatest poet:

> So in some wise all things wear round betimes,
> And wind up well.

Depends on the Viewpoint

Much depends upon your viewpoint as to acceptance or rejection of the statement in the caption.

If you believe that our form of government is a mistake; that national morals grow worse as the years go by; that as a nation we are so devoted to material progress that we neglect the weightier matters of the law, "judgment, righteousness and truth"; that the minds of our people, and by consequence their wills, are becoming more and more abased and less and less on the upward spiritual trend—if you are pessimistic as to the national present and future, you will not agree with the contention; or, if you do, will say, "More's the pity."

If, on the other hand, you are convinced, as is the vast majority of clear and high-thinking mankind, that the United States has been, is now, and for an indefinite future shall be, the hope of the world; that our methods of government and the results thereof, despite many shortcomings and temporary evils, come nearest the ideals of statesmen and patriots; that Americans grow more intolerant of wrong and more eager for the triumph of truth each year of their education in life; that, as the people learn the truth, they become the more determined that it shall prevail—if such are your sentiments you will say, The will of the people wins in the end; and that will makes for the righteousness which exalteth a nation, and defeats the sin that is a reproach to any people.

The Will of the People Must Be Moulded

Of course we do not live in a pure democracy. There never was a successful or lasting government wherein the untaught and emotional masses were supreme at the outset. We must have leaders of thought, teachers of truth. By spoken word in pulpit or school, by written precept in books or papers, by personal contact of the well-informed and worthy with the weaker and more ignorant brethren of the Republic, the vital differences between what is right and what is only expedient must be shown, appreciated, digested into mental and moral life.

It is related by Orientalists that five hundred years after the death of Buddha relics were discovered setting forth the eight fundamental and eternal principles of truth. Here they are:

Right views.
Right purposes.
Right professions.
Right judgments.
Right applications.
Right memories.
Right speech.
Right meditations.

When any great public question squares with these eight divisions the people of the United States will accept the affirmative, and see to it at the polls that their will in the matter becomes the fact made manifest.

What America's History Teaches

Our Republic came into being because the people willed it. Their "will" demanded liberty of conscience and of government. Their "won't" protested against taxation without representation, dominance by foreign governors and placemen who ignored the rights of the residents and toilers. We have a heritage of great names from Revolutionary times, but then, as under Cromwell, Eugene, William of Orange, or Garibaldi, the power of accomplishment depended upon the men who bore and served the guns.

In the most momentous and the fiercest war the nineteenth century knew the will of the majority of Americans was made manifest. When the Dred Scott decision, as an English writer put it, "made every Northerner a slave-catcher and every Southerner a slave-hunter," the will of the greater body of our people hardened into fell purpose that slavery must disappear from within our borders and that our borders must not be lessened by secession.

Abraham Lincoln

Harriet B. Stowe

Frances E. Willard

Wm. Lloyd Garrison

It took years of precept and example to anneal the wills of the Unionists into firm belief in abolition. Then they gave their lives and fortunes in behalf of their beliefs and it was all the greater triumph for the right that those who were wrong were also faithful, brave and, in the mass, honest.

Another Case of Educated Wills

More than a quarter of a century ago a Western State was rent almost to the point of riot by a financial question that seemed to have two sides to it. In earlier days, in order to secure much needed railways, the State had bonded its resources to the extent of several millions of dollars, which were given to promoters and captains of industry who promised to build and operate the needed roads.

Neal Dow

Elihu B. Washburne

Some of the roads were built, some of the promises faithfully kept. Other promises were ignored or meagerly fulfilled, and, beyond question, much of the State's money was frittered away or diverted into private bank accounts.

When the time for payment of a moiety of the bonds came there was a general sentiment for repudiation. Not only demagogues, but good citizens, argued that, as the contracts under which the money had been voted had been repudiated, it was fair and right that the debt should be disallowed. The State was not rich except in prospects. To pay the bonds meant hardship in the way of increased or continued taxes that reached every man's pocket.

For a time the voices of the clearer thinkers, who pointed out that the holders of the bonds were not to blame; that the faith, honor and future credit of the State were at stake, were drowned in the clamor of the repudiationists. The time for an election of legislators who should pass upon the vital question—payment or non-payment—came, and it seemed as if repudiation would surely win. In the State was an exceptionally large proportion of citizens of foreign birth, and to them the repudiationists made strong appeal, setting up that the bonds had been voted before they came into the State; that they certainly had derived little or no benefit from the issue, while upon them would fall full burden of discharge of the obligations.

It was a splendid campaign for righteousness. The pulpit with unanimity, the better portion of the press, all the true-blue, honorable citizens who, looking ahead, knew what repudiation meant from a material as well as from a moral view, banded as an army of argument, appeal and appreciation. The newly made Americans declined—when they saw the error of the repudiationists—to do the expedient thing. The legislature when elected was undoubtedly in favor of the dishonorable course, but the change in the will of the people, between the time of election and that of assembly, was so marvelous and so marked, the members did not dare to vote for repudiation.

Decency won and it was as distinctively a victory of the people's will as the history of our commonwealths can show. It aside from the ethics note the truth that, in paying the bonds as it did the State established its repute and credit in fashion that has stood in good stead from that day to this. The late Governor Johnson of Minnesota once said to me "In all the records of our country's life I know of no better example of the triumph of an educated popular will than was afforded by the victory of the anti-repudiationists in Minnesota."

Further Accomplishment Certain

Of all our Presidents Andrew Jackson, Abraham Lincoln and William McKinley most thoroughly appreciated and most freely relied upon the evolution of the will of the people of the nation in accomplished good. To Lincoln in his years of stress the support of the better part of his countrymen, expressed at the polls as well as on the battle lines, was the saving grace in most serious situations. In the last few months of his life, McKinley showed his knowledge of the trend of public belief toward tariff change, a trend that is made more and more manifest as the years go on.

No one can truly deny that the cause of temperance has made great strides within the last decade. Drunkenness is no longer a venial sin. Sobriety is as much a requisite nowadays in political and social life as it is in that of traffic and commerce. If it is not the will of the people—a will moulded by years of drink's devastation, by exhortation, example, statistics, experience—that has brought about the change and will make for further betterment, what was the compelling influence?

It was popular will that demanded and made possible many of our vast transportation lines by sea and land, and it was popular will that put the fear of the law into such public-service corporations as made a creed of unlawful gain. Not only the consent, but the co-operation, of the people must be had in future contests against organized rapine and corporated injustice.

Without the consent of the people there would be no Panama Canal. It will be public sentiment, in the last analysis, that will provide a new and more adaptable currency and fiscal system. When we have again an American merchant marine to show our flag on all the Seven Seas, we may be sure it has come by reason of the recognition of the need therefor on the part of the plain people.

Who can doubt what the effect of exposures concerning the awful traffic in white womanhood will be upon American sentiment? Who but believes that the death-knell of that traffic was sounded when the people were apprised of the facts?

Comparison with Other Nations

It is difficult to make comparisons with other nations in respect to this matter of ultimate triumph of the people's will. In no other great Power

A Fine Corps of Volunteer Workers

NOWHERE are the value and efficiency of volunteer work in religious enterprises more definitely demonstrated than in the evangelistic meetings of the Lemon Hill Association of Philadelphia. The visitor who casually drops in to one of the services is impressed with the few words in italics on the back of the programme: Our Chorus, Workers and Ushers, like the members of the Committee, are all volunteers. Every one invited to help. Every one present eager to do something for the good of some one else in particular, or for the assembly in general.

If you should stroll toward the Pavilion at Lemon Hill in Fairmount Park, on a midsummer Sunday, you would receive an invitation to enter, from some young man wearing an usher's badge and standing near the entrance of the amphitheatre. A second young man with a similar badge would offer you a programme. Another would show you to a seat, where another yet would give you a hymn book, and before long still another would offer you a Psalter. A volunteer choir of 300 singers leads the music. A chorus of 250 children sing selections from sprightly Gospel songs. Just before the preacher begins to speak, beautiful baskets of flowers are carried to the platform, the gift of some interested member who has a garden. At any point in the service, a motion of the hand or even a significant glance of the eye may convey an order or a suggestion from leader to worker and some part of the well-organized machinery is set in motion. Organization, co-operation, willing administration according to ability, are the secrets of success here. However spontaneous and easily accomplished all this appears to the visitor, it is in reality the result of earnest, consecrated, persistent devotion on the part of all. However blithe and holidaylike in appearance are the men and women who rally to the support of the leaders, they represent conscientious continuous effort and sacrifice.

400 Volunteer Gospel Workers in Evening Session

There are nearly 400 enrolled volunteer workers. They are many of them persons who are employed in stores and factories or in some trade; yet they come from their homes in different parts of the city to help in the various services on Saturdays and Sundays at Lemon Hill; they call on people in their homes and visit the sick during the week; and on every Friday evening the year round, through midsummer heat or wintry blasts, they meet for song, prayer and conference in preparation for the coming Sunday. Their work lasts the year round. After the summer season is closed, the Lemon Hill Association then lends its strength to the churches of Philadelphia, holding evangelistic services, especially in those which are laboring for Christ in the poorer sections of the city.

One of the pleasantest features of the summer work is the weekly Saturday outing for poor children. They are gathered from the back streets and alleys of the city, 1,000 or 1,200 boys and girls each week, irrespective of denomination, race, or color, and taken by the street cars to Lemon Hill; there, under the direction and care of the volunteers, some of whom are active business men well known in Philadelphia, an afternoon is spent with games and field-sports, followed by an ice-cream treat and concluded by a reverent service in the Pavilion. Only those who have seen the happy crowds of children at Mont-Lawn as they marched joyfully from their games to the Children's Temple for the song service, can realize the beauty and solemnity of such a gathering and the opportunity of telling these waifs from the streets of the Jesus who "loves all the little children of the world."

"It is doubtful if any one church of any denomination in our city is vitally in touch with more individuals and homes than is the non-sectarian church of Lemon Hill, which is no church at all, and has refused to become one, so far as denominational creed is concerned," says Dr. Ely, the founder and director of the work. "It differs from all individual church and institution work in that it does not aim to build up an institution in itself, but contributes to all Christian churches, increases the spirit of unity among Christian people and invites all classes alike to vital fellowship with God, through Jesus Christ." M. K. H.

THE KIDNAPPERS

By BERTHA BURNHAM BARTLETT

THE little house at the corner, supposed to rejoice in the name of "parsonage," but commonly referred to as "the Button-box," fairly brimmed over with children. Where the minister's wife put them all at nightfall one simply had to wonder, while the place in which the minister found silence for the preparation of his sermon was quite beyond the wildest conjectures of those who had time to think anything at all about it. Still, the children were all safely housed each night by the time the stars began to peep out, for Mother Button was a good and careful mother, and the sermons were all prepared somewhere—and good ones they were, too—and so nobody really gave much attention to the fact that the little house was so uncomfortably and inadequately and absurdly small.

But though the children were good and the sermons not to be disparaged, the salary for preaching the sermons, and which went to provide food and clothing for all the Buttons, was quite as absurdly insignificant as was the house itself, the two things of small proportions combining to make tired lines show in Father Button's earnest face, and all but discouraged ones in Mother Button's once pretty one. Yet the lines had grown so gradually that the people to whom the minister preached week after week and year after year never noticed them at all.

One day, however, a new family moved into the little town, and speedily beginning to attend church, began to discover things which the people of the town had known so long that they actually didn't know they existed. Having discovered them, moreover, Mrs. German proceeded to tell her new friends about them on the day of the sewing society, Mother Button being providentially kept at home by a sick headache.

"I don't wonder she has headaches," Mrs. German said energetically. "Why, ladies, I asked her where she usually took her vacations—and she laughed at me. 'Right here in my kitchen and sleeping-room,' she told me at last, that dreadful little wrinkle showing over her eyes. Then I—pumped, until she told me that she has never been out of this town once since she was married and came here a bride thirteen years ago, except once a year, when she goes to town for the day to buy cloth for the family clothing. Why, we church people ought to be ashamed of ourselves. Of course she can't get away easily, but she told me so pathetically that she and the minister planned in the courtship days to take their wedding journey 'when the new wore off of the little home.' Bless her! It wore off a good long while ago, I guess, but the babies — and a small salary—have kept them both tied at home. And we've let them!"

It was characteristic of Mrs. German to include herself in any cause for disapproval, so that now when she said "we" in that self-blaming fashion no one remembered that she at least had been innocent of selfishness toward the minister's family during the long baker's dozen of years.

"What can we do about it?" queried the president of the society somewhat aggrievedly. "They really wouldn't go and leave the children, I don't believe, and if they were willing to do so they haven't the money to go—and, dear me! who would go and stay with such a houseful of children, anyway?"

Mrs. German laughed gaily. "I've been fairly aching to have this society meet ever since I found out about her long-deferred wedding-tour — never dreamed, either, of such luck as her being sick with a headache—and I've laid awake nights planning out a scheme which you ladies will carry to completion, I know. We'll kidnap the children!"

There was a general gasp of consternation at this, but Mrs. German continued with undismayed fervor:

"Why not? It's they who are keeping those two blessed mortals from taking a real rest, and——"

"But they wouldn't go and leave——"

"Wouldn't they?"

"Besides, how could they go—how could she go—without having things made——"

"And money! Why, it will take lots."

"To be sure," assented Mrs. German, triumphantly elate over not having to suggest these indisputable matters concerning frills and wherewithal. "And won't it be fun getting her ready to go without her knowing a thing about it? I've got a blue silk that I never had made up, for the reason that it makes me look as if the undertaker needed to be called. It's just her color, however, and I'll donate that if somebody will make it up for her."

It was the president who, first catching the spirit, responded.

"My Annie is almost exactly her size," she announced with sudden inspiration. "I'll tell Mrs. Button that the dress is a surprise and ask her to let me fit it on her."

"Splendid!" ejaculated the prime mover.

"Underclothing," suggested another woman; "has any one any idea whether she'll need new ones?"

"Hers probably aren't pretty and dainty," rejoined the president. "Mine wouldn't be if I had to make clothes for seven children."

"That makes me think. What is to be done with the children if we do send their father and mother off for a week?"

"A week! Hear the innocent!" laughed Mrs. German, derisively. "Why, bless you, if we send them at all we must send them away for at least a good long month. As for the children—well, people who kidnap youngsters usually take good care of them with the expectation that they will receive a reward when they are returned. I mean to kidnap Baby Elsie; she takes to me pretty well."

"The twins used to play with my Florence before — before — I—I—oh, we'll take good care of the twins and I know they'll be good with us."

"The conductor smilingly handed the minister a letter"

The other mothers who knew that, since the last good-by kiss was pressed on little Florence's cold lips, no child had ever crossed the desolate home's threshold, knew how much Mrs. Tracy's implied offer meant, and were silent from sympathy for a moment.

"My Jack will be delighted to have Homer Button for a playmate," the president said at length, and then other offers came thick and fast, the ladies all but quarreling over the privilege of caring for the children.

It was decided that as soon as it was found that the measurements of the president's daughter and Mrs. Button were indeed identical, a sewing-bee should be secretively held at the president's home, and that there shirtwaists and skirts, a traveling suit, the silk gown, and undergarments galore, should be made and promptly packed into a small and delightfully new trunk. A handbag also was to be purchased and supplied with all accessories for a journey (even to snapshots of the children, a concession to parental heart-tuggings after those interesting small Buttons, together with a certified bank-check of satisfying proportions, the amount to be taken bodily from the treasury of the sewing circle.

"We've been hoarding our money for years," averred the secretary, who was responsible for the suggestion that such use be made of a portion of the funds, "Just hoarding it, ladies, meaning some day to have enough to build a good-sized parsonage. Now, it seems to me that a hundred dollars taken from what we have won't make so much difference after all when we do come to build. And, anyway, if we fall short only a hundred dollars we may think ourselves mighty fortunate and will find some way to raise it."

The other ladies agreed with delightful unanimity, save that it was voted to make the check twice as large as suggested, since the Reverend Mr. Button's needs were to be left wholly unsupplied until that gentleman should be able to purchase necessities for himself in some nearby city.

Through careful calculations the conspirators were enabled to have everything in readiness on a bright, sunny day in July, and then in response to a most urgent, but boyless, invitation the minister and his wife left for the city, where the minister was "expected" to perform a marriage ceremony for a former member of the Newton sewing circle, who had consented to be a fellow conspirator.

"I really want to go," confessed the minister's wife with a half-stifled sigh to the president of the society, "but I simply can't, for I haven't a gown that is suitable even for a home wedding. If I had a traveling suit—but I haven't."

The president's daughter caught her breath. "Wear mine—my new one," she begged insistently. "I'm going away next week, and shall never wear it here, so you needn't mind. And I'm sure I don't. Make her wear it, mother."

"Of course you will," seconded the relative, who felt a burden of responsibility rolling off her shoulders.

"And I ought to go, too," Mrs. Button explained apologetically the meaning of their departure, to the neighbors who promised to look after the little folks during their parents' absence. "I really ought, for it will be such a good chance to purchase sheets and pillow slips that I absolutely need. And Mr. Button is so short of summer clothing that—actually!——"

The neighbors laughed sympathetically. "We're glad you're going," they chorused. "Now don't worry. The children will be all right if you stay a month. Kiss them a dozen times round. And now hurry."

"No need of that," vetoed the minister, looking at his watch, and then at the familiar faces about them. "Dear people, I've—I've—been remiss, I think, in never telling you how dear you all are to us. I hope you'll miss the Buttons when the 'Box' is empty."

A sudden vision of how lonesome the town would be with an empty "Button-box" swept over the little company, ere Mrs. German could come to the rescue.

"No self-respecting community," she said with dignity, "no self-respecting community ever does have an empty button-box, Mr. Minister. Ah, dear me! You must hurry now, or you'll surely be late. Kiss the babies. Hurry!"

Hurry? Indeed, they did. Then, breathless, they seated themselves in the train already moving slowly from the station, the conductor smilingly placed a handbag, conspicuously new, in the carrier above their heads, and then as smilingly handed the minister a letter which, he explained, had just

THE TRAINING OF OUR CHILDREN

Women in Council

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

ONE of the puzzles that seem to baffle mothers is where to draw the line between truth and falsehood in the development of childish character. Even for us who are grown up truth is not always the easiest fact in attainment. We sometimes wonder what is true and what is false in our daily experience. To be literal is not always to be true. An imaginative person sees visions and dreams dreams. Take the every-day incident of testimony given by three or four persons in reference to a happening which they have seen. Very seldom does it occur that the descriptions of each are identical with one another. The impressions made upon the mind have been different and, in consequence, reports vary. This is the reason why circumstantial evidence is so frequently unfair and untrustworthy in its bearings upon cases in court.

On one point we are all in perfect accord. We regard truthfulness and sincerity as foundation stones in character building. We want our little children to be trained in telling the truth. Yet we must discriminate between the visions of an imaginative child and the fairy-land in which such a child dwells, and the deliberate telling of untruth through cowardice or meanness. With this preamble the topic is open for discussion in future veranda sessions. Mothers are invited to relate their success or failure in teaching their children to speak the truth.

A Young People's Library "Kindly give me an idea how to start a library for girls and boys in their teens? A. C. G."

As a nucleus for a circulating library for girls and boys in their teens, you cannot do better than to purchase a set of books issued by G. P. Putnam's Sons, under the general title of The Young People's Book Shelf. This particular collection of books is unrivaled in excellence of style and is distinguished for rare literary taste and beautiful illustration. It includes Famous Poems, Famous Tales, first, second and third series; Forty Famous Fairy Tales, Stories of Heroism from the World's History, Adventures Afloat and Ashore, Almost True Stories, The Book of Romance and Robinson Crusoe and His Island. Among the authors to be represented in a circulating library for the young I mention Robert Louis Stevenson, whose Treasure Island, Prince Otto, Kidnapped and David Balfour are books of perennial value. For the younger girls Anne of Green Gables, Anne of Avonlea, Rebeeca of Sunnybrook Farm, and the entire Little Colonel Series are sure to be useful. The Henty Books are one and all desirable for boys, so are any works by J. M. Barrie or S. R. Crockett. In biography, be sure to include The Life of Louisa M. Alcott, of Alice Freeman Palmer, and any life you can obtain of George Washington and Abraham Lincoln. These books will do for a beginning. Our readers are invited to contribute the names of any books which they have found attractive and profitable in the special line our correspondent has in mind.

Visiting the Sick Mrs. Dana was recovering by slow yet sure degrees from a surgical operation. The time had come when her friends were permitted to visit her, although the nurses gave a little hint as to the length of calls and the saving the patient's strength. The first friend who was admitted to the pleasant room in which Mrs. Dana sat on her couch propped up by pillows, thought the best thing she could do to cheer and entertain a person struggling back to health was to relate a series of harrowing events which had occupied the attention of the community while the patient had been in retreat on account of her illness. She omitted no detail of the illness and death and subsequent funeral of an elderly lady who had passed away since Mrs. Dana had gone to the hospital. It was hardly surprising that the nurse found the patient exhausted and weary, with a tendency to rising temperature, after the well-meaning but mistaken caller had taken leave.

Another visitor, equally kind and well meaning, but equally unskilled in the gentle art of visiting the sick, insisted on a recital of Mrs. Dana's remembered sensations after arriving at the hospital, and how she felt when emerging from the cloud of her anæsthetic; and having learned all that she could in this way she tranquilly proceeded to tell of other surgical operations with which she had been familiar, and of the necessity that had more than once occurred for their repetition. She, too, was a failure in the art of visiting the sick.

It should go without saying that when people are very ill, friends should be excluded from their presence, and only those should visit them who belong to the immediate family. A pastor is always welcome at the bedside of the dying, but he is not necessarily a desirable visitor in a room where the balance is hanging uncertainly between painful disease and healthful convalescence. Whoever enters a sick room should do so cheerily, but should avoid a simulation of cheer which would grate upon the nerves of one depressed by languor and suffering. A dress which rustles and rattles, a tread that shakes the floor, and, above all, the lowering of the voice to a whisper must be avoided when visiting the sick.

Which Is the Greater Imfirmity Two young women, both absolutely well and in possession of normal sight and hearing, fell the other day into a curious conversation which finally led to a heated argument. Is it not sigular that particularly in sultry weather people drift into violent discussions of purely irrelevant matters? Many domestic squalls, for example, might be labeled "much ado about nothing." These girls began by wondering which would be worse, to be blind or deaf? One held that the greater loss to comfort and independence was that of sight. To be shut in by a curtain of darkness from the beauty of this lovely world, to be unable to go about without an attendant, to read by the touch of the fingers, and to grope about in the sunlight as in midnight seemed to Dorothy the most insupportable of possible burdens. Eleanor, on the other hand, declared with emphasis that she would far rather be blind than deaf. "Think," she said, "how dreadful it would be to suffer imprisonment in a silent chamber where no melody of the birds, no sweet voices of dear ones, no breaking in of the ocean on the shore and no music of a great oratorio could penetrate the wall that divided you from these sources of pleasure."

This discussion is one that borders on futility, because in the nature of things it never can be settled whether deafness or blindness is the greater infirmity. There was once upon this earth of ours a man who walked the hills and dales of the land we have ever since called Holy, and with a word and a touch he unsealed deaf ears and opened blind eyes. He was the Son of man and the Son of God, both in one. Every one who has noticed those whose sight or hearing has become insufficient for daily use, must have been impressed by the comparative patience of the blind and its opposite irritability in the deaf. It seems as if helpers spring up in every direction to assist the blind, while, although the deaf are aided by audiphones and other inventions and appliances, their friends and neighbors are apt to treat them with neglect. People partially deaf are generally reluctant to acknowledge that they do not hear with their old acuteness, and therefore delicate shades and inflections in conversation are lost to them, and they often give hit or miss answers wide of the mark when they are talking with friends. The question must remain always unanswered. Meanwhile we may take to ourselves the comfort, if we belong in the company of those who suffer from either affliction, that the brave heart, the strong will and the efficient hand triumph over every obstacle. Rev. Dr. Matheson, blind from early manhood, was the author of several scholarly books and a successful minister of three large churches in Scotland. His hymn, "O Love That Will Not Let Me Go," has been sung around the world, and will always be a favorite with lovers of really fine music.

Fanny Crosby has been blind since infancy, but her hymns have been the inspiration of thousands in every land. One of these days she will see Him face to face whose praises she has sung so long.

A PEASANT WOMAN OF GREECE

As fair as Grecian women
In a shadowy older day,
This modern burden-bearer treads
The worn familiar way.

Her foot is sure, her step is light,
Her head is lifted high,
And o'er her spreads the laughing blue,
The sunlit, cloudless sky.

Here the Will of the People Wins

the world is it possible to secure a direct expression of what citizens desire and what they condemn. Scotland is not a nation apart, though it is conspicuous among "all people who on earth do dwell" for its steadfastness in demanding and its success in securing what the conscience of its canny folk declares its due. In England, while the commons may win in the end, a measure distinctly in disfavor with the lords and gentry has a long and difficult course to run. In Germany the will of the Emperor has, at least, an even chance of triumph as against that of a mere majority of his subjects. France, even as a republic, has not been noted as a popular government and few doubt that in Spain the earnest desire of the great mass of the people is for a republic. Whether Spain is fitted for popular government is another matter altogether. No one cites Russia or Austria-Hungary as examples of governments of, by and for the people, while Switzerland is too small for comparison with the United States, and Italy is essentially either a kingdom or a churchly principality.

To sum up the whole matter: It is fair to assume and contend that in no other land than America are grave national (not sectional or local) questions settled in the end in accordance with what the great mass of the public believes to be just and right. If this conclusion is not true, then logically it is time for changes in our essentials of government—and who advocates such changes, dissatisfied as many may be with particular instances, causes or effects?

The Glorious Outlook

In conclusion, and as a thoroughfaced optimist so far as America is concerned, let me quote sundry sentences from the "Foreword" in a recent issue of one of our best-known magazines:

"Above our prosperity, stronger than the steel that girds our traffic and more fruitful than our wide harvests, is the benediction of things unseen. We have begun to build deep for the eternities. The country for which Washington strove and which Lincoln loved has become great in the kingdom of the Spirit. In no other land in twenty centuries of upward striving for the race has there been so reverent, widespread and potent communion with God. It is giving songs of gladness to the desolate. It is restoring to man his divine inheritance. It is giving him dominion and power. The triumph of the soul is setting the captives free."

Never has a great nation so diligently sought to grasp the things that are eternal. Our twentieth century citizenship in the kingdom that cometh without observation has its parallel only in that day when "Israel walked with God."

HOME-GOING

WHERE will He bring me home? I cannot tell
Amid what mountain slopes or vales declining
The angels rove, 'mid beds of asphodel,
Where God's own face-light is forever shining;
I only know that somewhere waits for me
A blessed home, where "many mansions" be.

How will He bring me home? I do not know.
It may be by a thorny road of pain;
It may be by a path prolonged and slow,
Over rough deserts, or by sandy plain;
But this I know, however it may be,
I cannot miss my goal—"He leadeth me."

When will He bring me home? that too is hid;
Perchance there yet is labor I can do;
It may be that my work shall be amid
These earthly scenes a few brief years or so;
It may be He will say, "Thy work is done,"
Before the setting of to-morrow's sun.

But will He bring me home? Yes, that He will!
The promise faileth not He giveth me,
And like sweet music all my life doth fill
His message, "Where I am, ye, too, may be."
What matter where or how my life is passed,
If I but see my Father's face at last?

WE'RE TRAVELING ON

Words by FANNY J. CROSBY — Music by Hubert P. MA

1. We are trav-'ling on to the Cit-y of the blest, Where the where the tried
ev-er dwell tried..... and faith-ful dwell;..... We are trav-'ling on to a where the tried
ev-er dwell
hap-py vale of rest, Where we meet no more to say fare-well.
CHORUS.
Trav-'ling on,..... we're trav-'ling on..... To a

II.

We are traveling on and whatever may betide,
We will trust our Saviour's love;
We will lift our eyes where the peaceful waters glide
In the home that waits for us above.

III.

Through the toils of earth if we follow His command,
Though the clouds and storms descend,
He will keep us all in the hollow of His hand,
And will bring us safely to the end.

IV.

We are traveling on to a realm of perfect day,
To a world of summer flowers,
Where the night is o'er and the shadows fly away,
And a robe and crown will then be ours.

THE "OLD FARMER" GRATEFUL

SOME time ago this journal published a short account of an aged farmer in Missouri, who had come under the harrow of misfortune. He was bravely striving to keep his little farm and to hide from his neighbors the knowledge of his struggle, but it is a difficult thing to keep one's courage up when affairs are going from bad to worse. This old farmer has a son whom he was helping to work his way through college, but he could help him no more. A crisis seemed to be at hand in his affairs. Hearing of his case THE CHRISTIAN HERALD stated the facts for the information of its readers yet without giving the old farmer's name. The result was that a number of friends, touched with sympathy for the brave old man who seemed to be fighting an almost hopeless battle, sent in small sums of money to help him temporarily. These kind remembrances were duly forwarded to him and, in acknowledging their receipt he writes this letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

I received a draft from you for $108.62 sent you by the good people that wish to assist me. Say to those good people to please accept my heartfelt thanks. I not only thank you for this aid, but also for the principle that prompted you to minister unto me. Believe me, it was appreciated. I want to express my gratitude to those who sent aid by mail direct to me. This has greatly assisted me; it has lightened my burden and has caused me to remember the words of the Psalmist: "Why art thou cast down, O my soul? Hope thou in God."

May God bless you and all of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family is my prayer.

The Homes That Never Serve Oatmeal

In the lowliest sections of our largest cities not one home in twelve serves oats. Among the homes of the highest types we breed, seven-eighths are oatmeal homes

Where People Don't Know

We have made a house-to-house canvass of the tenement districts, both of New York and Chicago.

We have gone to the homes where are bred the anemic, the incapable the undeveloped. Where tuberculosis finds its ready prey. Where the average child is extremely nervous, and it shows at school the lack of concentration.

We have talked with the mothers who know the least about that which contributes to health and growth, to mental and physical power. To the ignorant, the careless, the unadvised.

We find in those sections that not one home in twelve serves oats in any form. Most of the stores supplying those sections scarcely sell oatmeal at all.

Where People Do Know

We have canvassed hundreds of homes of the educated, the prosperous, the competent—the homes of the leaders in every walk of life. We have talked with the mothers who know food values, or who are guided by physicians who know.

We find that oatmeal is a regular diet in seven out of eight of these homes. The percentage is even larger if we leave out the childless homes. We find that four-fifths of all college students come from these oatmeal homes.

We find that eight-tenths of all physicians serve oatmeal at home. We find, in one university, that 48 out of 50 of the leading professors regularly eat oatmeal.

We find that Boston consumes 22 times as much oatmeal per capita as do two certain States with lowest average intelligence.

What Does This Mean?

This doesn't mean that some can afford oats and others cannot. Quaker Oats—the finest oatmeal produced—costs but one-half cent per dish. And a pound of Quaker Oats supplies the nutrition of six loaves of bread.

It means that some know, and others don't know, the food needs of a child. Some know, and some don't know, what the food of youth means in a child's career.

Some know, and some don't know, that the highest authorities on foods for the young give the first rank to oatmeal.

Facts About Oats

Oats are far richer than all other cereals in proteids, organic phosphorus and lecithin.

Proteid is the body-builder, the energy-giving food. The average man at the average work uses up 3½ ounces of proteid per day.

Phosphorus is the most important element in the structure of the brain. Lecithin is the most important in the structure of the nerves and nerve centers.

Oats hold first place as a perfectly balanced food. It is the staple food of the world's hardiest race, famous for brain and brawn.

There is nothing else which compares with oats as a breakfast food for the young. Nothing else so well supplies the needs of the years of growth.

It is also a food of which one never tires—one of the most delicious foods in existence.

Quaker Oats

Just the Rich, Plump, Luscious Oats

By 62 siftings we pick out the richest, plumpest grains that grow for use in Quaker Oats. We get only ten pounds of such oats from a bushel. It is thus we secure that enticing flavor found only in Quaker Oats.

Millions of homes, almost the world over, have found this the best of the oat foods.

It has a larger sale than all others combined because children like it best.

LACK OF MONEY

Was a Godsend in This Case.

It is not always that a lack of money is a benefit.

"A lady, of Green Forest, Ark., owes her health to the fact that she could not pay in advance the fee demanded by a specialist to treat her for stomach trouble. In telling of her case she says:

"I had been treated by four different physicians during 10 years of stomach trouble. Lately I called on another who told me he could not cure me; that I had neuralgia of the stomach. Then I went to a specialist who told me I had catarrh of the stomach and said he could cure me in four months but would have to have his money down. I could not raise the necessary sum and in my extremity I was led to quit coffee and try Postum.

"So I stopped coffee and gave Postum a thorough trial and the results have been magical. I now sleep well at night, something I had not done for a long time; the pain in my stomach is gone and I am a different woman.

"I dreaded to quit coffee because every time I had tried to stop it I suffered from severe headaches, so I continued to drink it although I had reason to believe it was injurious to me, and was the cause of my stomach trouble and extreme nervousness. But when I had Postum to shift to it was different.

"To my surprise I did not miss coffee when I began to drink Postum.

"Coffee had been steadily and surely killing me and I didn't fully realize what was doing it until I quit and changed to Postum."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

GOSPEL INVITATION

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

"JESUS answered and spake again." He was still talking to the priests, elders and Pharisees to whom he had spoken the parables of the Vineyard. They had set themselves against the truth he had come to reveal, and they needed some convincing arguments in the way of home thrusts, which Jesus proceeded to give them in the parable of the King's Marriage Feast, which was in reality a picture of their unfaithfulness to God.

A Marriage Feast

It is significant that Jesus should take a marriage feast as a symbol of the Gospel feast. There is no occasion quite so happy as a marriage feast. Jesus thus teaches the joy of religion.

"Sent forth his servants to call them that were bidden." Jesus had in mind the custom in the Orient of sending reminders to those who had been invited. This was necessary because there were no timepieces, as clocks or watches. In our own land to send a reminder would be almost an insult, but it was a courtesy in the Orient.

"And they would not come." Courtesy was met with discourtesy; those who were invited and reminded actually refused to come! Among Orientals, particularly among the Mohammedans, to refuse an invitation to a marriage feast is an act against God.

"And he sent forth other servants." The king who had made the marriage feast was long suffering; he sent his servants to persuade them to come by telling them about all of the good things which had been prepared for them.

"They made light of it; treated them shamefully, and killed them." So had the Jews treated the teachers and the prophets whom God had sent to invite them to the Gospel feast, and they had followed their own ways, many of them by adopting the idolatry of the nations they had been sent to conquer.

"Sent his armies and destroyed those murderers and burned their city." It is probable that Jesus here referred to the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus in 70 A.D.

"Go ye, therefore, unto the partings of the highways." The king sent other servants, not to the homes where he had before sent, but to far-removed places.

"As many as ye shall find bid to the marriage feast." This was indicative of the Gospel to be preached to the Gentiles.

"And the wedding was filled with guests," the world coming to Christ.

"A man who had not on a wedding garment." He had no excuse for not having on the festal robe, for all guests were supplied with them by the master of the feast, so that to appear without one showed gross discourtesy and dishonoring of the occasion.

"Bind him hand and foot, and cast him into outer darkness." And thus the man who would not conform to the conditions which the invitation implied, received his just punishment. And thus shall it be done to those who refuse the robe of righteousness which Jesus provides for all who come to the Gospel feast. It will not do for us to be "as good as we can be," when Jesus has told us to be "perfect, even as your Father in heaven is perfect." Such a spotless robe can not in any way be obtained by us of ourselves; it is the gift of God, because Jesus Christ paid for it with the coin of his own blood.

"Many are called, but few chosen." All are invited to the Gospel feast: Jews and Gentiles. All who will come are chosen. "As many as received him, to them gave he the right to become children of God." John 1: 12. Henry Ward Beecher said: "The elect are whosoever will; the non-elect are whosoever won't." It has been said by another: "Do not be frightened by this text, as if God called a thousand men to him, then took out a certain number of the thousand and sent all the rest away. This is not the teaching of the divine Gospel. Read it thus: Many are called, but few come; many are named, but few are real."

Those of the Highways

We will find them in all parts of the world. Jesus said: "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature." There are "highways" in our own cities; perhaps in our own home we shall find those who need the Gospel; in our own land certainly there are many to whom we can carry the Gospel invitation, and in the whole world it is said there are at least 1,000,000,000 who have not yet received the Gospel. Let us learn from the way in which Jesus worked among men how and where we should carry his message.

This is what Mr. Amos R. Wells says of Christ as a missionary:

"Christ was a home missionary in the house of Lazarus.

"Christ was a foreign missionary when the Greeks came to him.

"Christ was a city missionary when he taught in Samaria.

"Christ was a children's missionary when he took them in his arms and blessed them.

"Christ was a Sunday School missionary when he opened the Scriptures, and set men to studying the Word of God.

"Christ was a missionary to the poor when he opened the eyes of the blind beggar.

"Christ was a missionary to the rich when he opened the spiritual eyes of Zaccheus.

"Even on the cross Christ was a missionary to the robber; and his last command was the missionary commission."

So long as there is one in our family out of Christ, we have missionary work to do in our home.

As long as there is a heathen in the world we should have a share in the world's missionary work, either by prayer, by gifts, by personal testimony or by teaching.

As long as there are souls out of Christ in our city we should ally ourselves with plans for city evangelization, if there are such; if not, we should inaugurate such plans.

We should look after the neglected children in our own city, and in Christ's name try to better their condition. In this, the beautiful work which Dr. Klopsch did at Mont-Lawn should be an inspiration to us.

We can all follow the example of Christ as a Sunday School teacher, because not half of the children in the United States have as yet been gathered into the Sunday School. It would be well to start a house-to-house visitation in the town or city where you live, for the purpose of bringing into the Sunday School all children who do not now attend. Or you might go out on the street on Sunday morning, and give to each passing child a pretty picture paper with an invitation to come to your Sunday School in the afternoon. One teacher, who did this in New York City, added one hundred and eighty-two members to the school the first Sunday, and sixty-five the second Sunday.

Sunday School Lesson

So long as there are any poor people your city there is a ministry of con- ation for you to enter upon in the me of Christ. You can not open the es of blind beggars as he did, but u can soothe pain and relieve press- g want. This is why God in his odness has bestowed such an abun- nce upon you. Think not that he in- ded it all for your own use.

Has it ever occurred to you that re are miserable rich people in the rld whom you might help to be ppy? Perhaps you have thought ause they had money enough to buy erything they desired, they were te happy. When Jesus went to the ne of Zaccheus, he saw there was mething he could do for a rich man. l there not a rich man or a rich man in your city whom you could lp to learn the blessedness of loving l serving Jesus?

After Jesus had visited Zaccheus, vat a wonderful distribution Zac- us made of his property, restoring ur-fold all that he had gained by de- lting, and giving a large share of t remainder to benevolence. A few ars ago a rich man gave his check sixty thousand dollars to start ssionary work in Korea. As a result re are now thousands upon thou- nds of Christians in Korea, and over hundred thousand children are in Sunday Schools of that country, al the end is not yet. A rich farmer sports a missionary substitute in Cina. He found that he could spare 000 more, and he inquired of the ission Board where "it would bring t largest return." He was given full ticulars as to an opportunity for ning up a district where a million ple had not yet heard of the Sav- ior. He was so interested that he not y sent the $1,000, but promised that should be an annual contribution, l sent an additional $1,000 toward ding missionary helpers to other fields.

As long as you shall live there is nsionary work for you to do among e people of the highways. Even n he was dying Jesus gave the spel message to a penitent thief. Perhaps your dying words may lead to e salvation of a soul. Many dying ristians have spoken such words.

How Children May Help

ne Sunday afternoon, in Scotland, n the Sunday School lesson for the had been finished, and the scholars gone to the neighboring church to r an address, the superintendent l to the children a letter from a nsionary in the Fiji Islands. The er described the savage and cruel s of the cannibals who live there, the power that the Gospel had obtained over many of them in transforming their lives. Having finished reading the account, the gentleman looked around and said: "I wonder if there is a boy here this afternoon who will become a missionary, and by and by take the Gospel to cannibals?" There was one boy who said in his heart, "Yes, God helping me, I will." He made no outward sign, nor did he tell any one at that time of his decision. He went home alone. When he reached a certain part of the road where there was a wall, he climbed over it, and kneeling down on the other side asked God to accept him and make him a good missionary to the heathen. That boy was James Chalmers, who afterwards preached the Gospel to the savages in New Guinea. As to the Fiji Islands, when we visited there on our way from Australia three years ago, we were told by a missionary who had been there for twenty years that there were at that time ninety thousand Fijians, and that they were all church attendants. The place of cannibals has thus become one of the most Christian spots in the world.

When Eliza Agnew was only eight years of age she was shown a map on which all heathen lands were printed in black. She said to herself, "When I grow up I shall go to one of those black countries and tell the people that Jesus loves them." Twenty-two years passed, and Eliza Agnew was given the opportunity to go as a missionary to the Island of Ceylon. There she found no girl or woman who could read. It was told her that they could not learn to read any more than sheep could, and that all they were good for was to cook food. Miss Agnew did not get discouraged, but prayed to God to help her. One day there came a great shower of rain, and two little girls sought shelter in the missionary's house. She gave the girls some bananas to eat. This made the mother of one of the girls very angry, for she said her daughter had lost caste (been disgraced) by eating food in a stranger's house. So said the mother to Miss Agnew: "You have given my child food. You may take her and bring her up." This was the answer to Miss Agnew's prayer. She fed and clothed the child, and taught her the Tamil alphabet. Soon other girls joined her, and in a short time many of them had learned the two hundred and forty-seven letters of that wonderful alphabet. Then a larger school for girls was opened. At least one thousand girls studied there, who gave their much-loved teacher the name of "The Mother of a Thousand Daughters." And many of those same "daughters" went out all over Ceylon to live among their people as professing Christians.

BONDS VERSUS CASH

DURING the financial depression of 1907 a number of firms which had plenty of money deposited in bank found themselves unable to use that money because of the failure or temporary closing of their banks. Some of these firms were nearly driven to the wall in consequence of not being able immediately to draw the cash which was rightfully theirs.

It occurred to the head of one of these firms that it would be much better to buy a number of securities, which might be kept in a lock box and might at any time be turned into cash, rather than to depend upon the exigencies of the banking situation. To invest a large amount of money in bonds immediately was not practicable, but with the object of securing the desired protection before another financial depression could occur the firm indicated above made special arrangements with a well-known banking house as follows:

The banking house was placed upon the firm's weekly pay-roll. On every pay-day a separate check is drawn in addition to the regular salary check and is sent to the banking house mentioned, with instructions to have it deposited in what is known as the firm's regular bond account. The banking house accepts the money and at proper intervals invests it in good bonds, which are sent to the various firms as the bonds are acquired. At least one of the firms indicated has now a very large holding of bonds, which stand not only as a reassurance of protection from disaster, but which at the same time yield a profit in the form of yearly interest.

Better Than Money in Bank

During the depression of 1907 many persons thought it expedient to carry large amounts of money in lock boxes. This saved them from the predicament in which firms that could not use their bank reserves were placed. But on the other hand, as the money thus remained idle, it earned its owners no profit for quite an extended period of time. The practice of acquiring bonds as a reserve has the advantage of being quite as safe and at the same time yielding a good profit. It might be argued that bonds are not saleable during periods of depression. On the other hand, Wall Street during the 1907 depression was full of bargain-hunters who showed a capacity and willingness to absorb large quantities of securities at the then prevailing prices.

Now, if the practice of buying bonds for the reason and in the manner suggested above is deemed wise by such concerns, why would it not be just as desirable for the individual who wishes to provide for the possible rainy day? If the large firm finds it expedient to place the bond house upon its pay-roll, sending money weekly or monthly until enough has been acquired to buy bonds, why could not the householder or the farmer in like manner lay aside a certain amount weekly or monthly, which would accumulate with the very definite oject of buying bonds?

The money might be deposited in a savings bank until such time as a sufficient amount had been acquired for the purchase of a bond. Where bond certificates are sold upon instalments it might be sent directly to the bond house, or it might be held in the family treasury until the amount necessary for the purchase of one or more bonds had been accumulated. It would perhaps be better to deposit the amount weekly in a savings bank, because it would then begin to draw interest regularly, and thus the earning power of the investment would be, as it were, set in motion even before the bond was actually purchased.

How to Begin

If the intending bond purchaser happened to be a storekeeper, he might reserve a weekly amount equal to the wages of one employee. If he happened to be a farmer, he might set aside a definite percentage of his monthly expenses. If he happened to be a wage earner with a raise in hand, he might set aside that raise each week for the purchase of a bond, instead of using it to defray the expense of an increase in his mode of living. If the person, whatsoever his walk of life, happened to have a reserve fund already saved, he might start in and purchase bonds at once, since it happens that bonds have never, with the exception of the depression of 1907, been cheaper than they are at the present time.

A bond has an advantage over many other forms of securities in that it is redeemable at par upon the date of its expiration. Bonds fluctuate in market value just like other forms of securities. A bond worth say $100 par may drop 20 points. That is, it may come to be worth but $80 in the open market. When its term of life has expired, however, it may be redeemed at the value expressed upon its face, which, in the case supposed above, would be $100, so that a person who purchased a $100 bond at say $80, would receive $100 for it when its term had expired in addition to the interest which would be paid on it each year during its period of life. Individual purchasers of bonds usually buy for investment, seldom for speculation. That is, they expect to keep the securities until they are retired. The fear of the bond fluctuating in price after it has been purchased need not, therefore, worry them. If the company which issues the bond is financially sound the owner of the bond can confidently expect in the end to be paid the full amount of the money promised on its face.

The qualification is of course highly important. However, the care necessary in selecting a good bond need not be nearly so great as with some other forms of investment. If the prospective investor select a bond house of known probity, the details of selecting the bond itself need not cause much worriment, because first-class bond houses are as careful in the selection of a bond issue as the customer possibly could be in the selection of the individual bond itself.

THE KIDNAPPERS

been handed to him together with the satchel.

Together the minister and the minister's wife read the missive:

Dear Friends: We knew you wouldn't consent if we suggested it, so we acted without your knowledge. We've kidnapped the children and you cannot have them for one month whether you return or not. If, one month from to-day, our reward is paid—a minister and a minister's wife with rested faces—the children will be forthcoming to greet you. Otherwise they will be withheld until the minister and his wife do look rested. In the satchel which the conductor will hand you are a few things such as the babies' pictures, and a certified check, the love-offering of the ladies of the church, while you will also find a trunk check and a key. You will doubtless want to add to the contents of the trunk, though we have tried to anticipate Mrs. Button's wants. The minister need not worry over the pulpit supply, since he is entitled to a year's vacation by this time. His engagement contract stated that he should be allowed a month each year—which heretofore he never took. Keep Mrs. German notified of your address and you will be notified of sickness, if such comes to your children. No news will be good news, remember. And the wedding is all a hoax.

The minister drew a long breath.

"Well?" he said interrogatively.

"It's — it's — high-handed!" gasped the minister's wife.

The minister nodded. "Just that," he said quietly, "but, little wife, I think we can trust such people—people who do such loving things. And—I've been noticing, too, that—the minister's wife looked tired out."

The minister's wife giggled a r v-ous little giggle. "And I, that he minister looked—and preached ti l."

"Sauce-box!" chided the mini r; then, persuasively: "Let's forget at there are any children—let's make is a wedding trip after all—our wed ng trip, Millicent?"

But the minister's wife shook er head to part of this proposition as he dived into the satchel's depths.

"Aren't they dear?" she cried as he gazed rapturously upon the snaps ts. "Forget there are any babies? ll, I guess not, Harold. But—we'll e- tend—why they are kidnapped! ll, we'll gather the reward together nd carry it back to reclaim them. Le — let's go to the White Mountains."

"Or the sea," reminded the mini r, smiling to see the girlish color cr p- ing into the lovely cheeks as he planned. "I wonder what I shall ve to purchase before we go," he a ed practically.

Mrs. Button with sudden inspira on gasped delightedly.

"We've got to find out," she e- clared. "Hadn't we — O Harol — it will be such fun—hadn't we b er spend one day at the Griggs Ho e? Then we can look over the tr k. What do you suppose is in it?"

And an hour later Mrs. Germa e- ceived her anticipated telegram sta g that after twenty-four hours sper at the Griggs House all communica ns might be sent to Manchester-by- e- Sea.

There was consternation in the l le parish when, at dinner-time that y, the several wives and mothers n- nected with the Ladies' Society n- formed their husbands of the do s of the society, adding that the pa h committee would be obliged to en e a ministerial supply since the min er had accepted the situation, belie g that the parish, as a whole, were g- nizant of his sudden leavetaking.

And then because the leaven as good, the whole lump with one imp se responded to the action thereof, an it was determined to make that mont of the minister's absence a month of wonder-working indeed.

The town, though small, was an n- usually well-to-do one, and now th eyes suddenly opened the church pe le recognized that the salary which y had paid with commendable pro t- ness had been uncommendably sm ll, and almost without opposition it s decided to increase the amount for e future, while to supplement that of e past they determined to make t ir pastor's return a season of surpris a fitting culmination to the experienc of the month.

And then—but really my stor is done, and I do not need to tell yo of the return of the travelers, who, h the ransom agreed upon in their n possession, arrived to find that t ir kidnapped children awaited their c ing in the parsonage, which even in e dim light of evening seemed some y not quite familiar as they entered e gate, but which could never be o r than the dearest spot on earth to e minister and his wife.

Mercy to the Fallen*

WITH the exception of the parable of the Prodigal Son, there is probably no other which has so touched the heart of the world as that of the Lost Sheep.

It appeals to the highest and noblest of impulses. Earthly power doth surely seem likest to God's when justice is tempered by mercy, as Portia eloquently tells us.

The savage knows little of this softening and refining trait. Among those who looked upon the danger of Captain John Smith were many Indian men and women, but, so far as the record tells us, only one of them, Pocahontas, was deeply moved by the distress of his situation.

The fact is, the natural emotions of the human heart are not those which uplift. Men in their untaught state are said to revel in the misfortunes of others—to love to see their fellow-beings suffer, and to flock eagerly to games and shows which involve risk of life or limb. The wolfish taste for blood and torture is deeply ingrained into the human system, and centuries may yet be required to eliminate it.

In the same line, the man or woman who is down is all too likely to be neglected and even abused. We are accused, as a nation, of worshiping the great goddess Success. The man who has failed, and especially the woman who has made wreck of her life, seems to fill us with contempt, instead of divine pity.

There is no more hopeful sign of the sure elevation of our race than the growth among us of a vast humanitarian movement. Its results can be seen on every side. The brute indifference to suffering and love of torture are surely declining, and a desire to mitigate the hard lot of the unfortunate and the sinner are visible on every side.

It was once considered weak and effeminate to be pitiful. Jesus was probably scorned as much for his injunctions on this score as on any other; and Paul well knew the hard and pagan cruelty of the great mass of men the world over, when he accused them of being "implacable, unmerciful, despiteful," with mouths "full of cursing and bitterness"; "wild olive trees"; "carnal," full of "envying, strife and divisions"; "biting and devouring one another"; while the fruits of the Spirit were "love, gentleness, peace, long suffering." Christians were to "bear one another's burdens"; to be "kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving"; and those that were "overtaken in a fault," the brethren who were "spiritual" were to "restore," considering themselves, "lest they also be tempted."

The great lesson of the Gospel is that of mercy. It is founded upon the mercy of God in sending his only Son to die for us. It is spread and impressed by the mercy of godly men for benighted and suffering sinners.

The very name of Christ is often used as a synonym for pity. "Thou Most Compassionate," Whittier calls him in "My Dream." In Lowell's "Vision of Sir Launfal," the giving of the crust to the beggar symbolizes the saving grace in man—the sweet essence of pity.

An anonymous poet has put into touching verse the story of the lost sheep. It is in the dialect of the negro race, which lends itself so readily to poetic treatment.

ut de Shepherd he smile, like de lil' brack sheep
He hol' it de mostest dear.

* * *

n' de Shepherd go out in de darkness,
Where de night was cold and bleak;
n I dat lil' brack sheep, he fin' it
An' lay it agains' his cheek.
n' de hirelin' frown, "O Shepherd, Don' bring dat sheep to me."
at de Shepherd he smile, an' he hol' it close,
An' dat lil' brack sheep—was me.

Proud—of What?*

ONE of our great philosophers has written, "Men of extraordinary success in their honest moments have always sung, 'Not unto us, not unto us.'"

The great heart feels that whatever it may achieve is due to a Power above and beyond it. The little soul is seldom capable of such self-abnegation. It says to itself of its work, "Is not this great Babylon that I have builded?"

And yet there are very few of us who do not cherish in some secret chamber of our hearts a wicked pride.

The commonest and most vulgar form of pride is that of material possessions—of the flocks and herds, the silver and the gold.

Pride in birth and ancestry is but a little higher than this. Intellectual pride is but a little higher still. As for spiritual pride, it is, although exercised in the highest field of all, the most contemptible. There is no kind of pride which is not degrading.

We use sometimes the expression "a proper pride." By this we mean merely self-respect and a right dignity. The line where this merges into genuine pride is clear and unmistakable. Just as soon as it grows into a feeling that one is better than others, a feeling of vanity for superiority in any line—that moment the border line is crossed between sin and virtue.

A poor washerwoman in Concord was seen to be hurrying her work and rolling down her sleeves considerably before her usual hour for leaving.

"I'm going out," she informed her employer, with a pleased and rather consequential air.

"Where are you going, Bridget?"

"To hear Mr. Emerson lecture."

"Why, he is very deep, Bridget. Most of us can't understand him very well."

"Oh, I don't understand him, mum, but I like to see him stand up there and talk as if he thought everybody else was as good as he was."

The great philosopher was absolutely free from pride and he made his hearers realize his perfect democracy of feeling.

A similar story is told of Phillips Brooks, another large-hearted man. A poor scrubwoman once asked him if he would allow her daughter to be married in the chapel, "because," said she, "the big church is not for the likes of me."

"Oh, yes, it is," he replied promptly. "It is for the likes of you and the likes of me and the likes of everybody."

Pride of opinion is perhaps the most common fault of us fairly educated and intelligent moderns. We form our judgments and then, as it were, defy any one to change them. It is said that no one has ever been converted by abstract argument.

At the time of the great disaster in Martinique, the Italian bark Orsolina was taking on a cargo of sugar there. Her captain was accustomed to volcanoes and he did not like the appearance of Mont Pelée. Not half his cargo was on board, but he decided to sail for home.

"The volcano is all right," argued the shippers. "Finish your loading."

"I don't know anything about Mont Pelée," said the captain, "but if Vesuvius looked that way I'd get out of Naples, and I'm going to get right out of here."

The shippers threatened him with arrest. They sent customs officers to detain him, but the captain persisted in leaving. Twenty-four hours later the shippers and the customs officers lay dead in the ruins of St. Pierre.

Most of us are equally tenacious of our own views, even in the face of overwhelming evidence. Let us pray to be delivered wholly from this fault.

SPEND $6.50—GET A MODERN BATHROOM!

At Last! Modern bathing facilities without running water, water works or plumbing. New invention solves problem. Costs but $6.50 complete with heater---yet actually gives bathing facilities.

Sectional View

EQUAL TO MOST LAVISHLY EQUIPPED BATHROOM

Unlike anything you've ever heard of. Used wherever water exists in any room, any part of the house. So energizes and distributes water that very little does more than tub-full old way. Combines in one bath, one operation, one cost, the properties of four baths---cleansing, friction, massage and shower, plus shampoo. Hot or cold---any temperature---any time --- any place. Adapted for all members of the family --- no difference. One Texas user writes: "Children cry for it." Makes bathing 5 minute operation---longer if preferred---every minute a pleasure. Cleanses and operates almost automatically. No tubs, bowls or buckets to fill---no wash-rags, cloths or sponges---no dirt, odor, splashing, or muss. Banishes drudgery before, during, and after bathing.

See how simple, easy, convenient: To bathe, just do this --- place self-heating fountain on wall---fill with water---touch a match, turn regulator---that's all. Thereafter, it energizes and works automatically. Just think! Only clean, running, energized water touches body---no immersion---no using same water twice. What a pleasure---what a bath---what a boon to humanity! All hardship, drudgery, annoyance, wiped out. Could anything be more perfect? Sounds too good to be true, yet it's no experiment. Over 100,000 sold. USED BY U. S. GOVERNMENT, famous Battle Creek Sanitarium, and other celebrated authorities. Guaranteed by a $50,000. house. Not sold in stores. Sent anywhere. Send no money, but do investigate. Let us prove these claims---refer you to nearby users. Get our personal trial offer, catalogue, testimonials---all free. Just risk 1 cent---a postal---to get acquainted.

Get this Portfolio and make your house beautiful, too

IT has pictures in color of each separate room and several exteriors, similar to those shown on this page. Each one is accompanied by a complete specification not only for painting or otherwise treating the walls, floors, ceilings and woodwork, but also definite suggestions for curtains, hangings, rugs and furniture. The outside suggestions include not only color schemes for the house to harmonize with any given background or setting, but also definite suggestions for beautifying the grounds.

Write today for this Portfolio. It is intended to help you make your house beautiful, as well as to interest you in the best paints and varnishes.

What colors should you paint the outside of your house?

MORE thought is usually given to interior decoration than to exterior decoration; yet nothing makes or mars the outside effect of a house as its color. Its color should be appropriate to the backgrounnd. A seaside house should be painted or stained a cool gray to offset the glare of the sun. A house buried in the woods should be in some light color to bring out best the contrast with the green.

You should know, first, what color to paint your house, and second, what paint will give the most lasting and durable satisfaction.

The Sherwin-Williams' suggestions for outside painting include, first, the correct color scheme for your house; second, the particular Sherwin-Williams' product to use to obtain the best result.

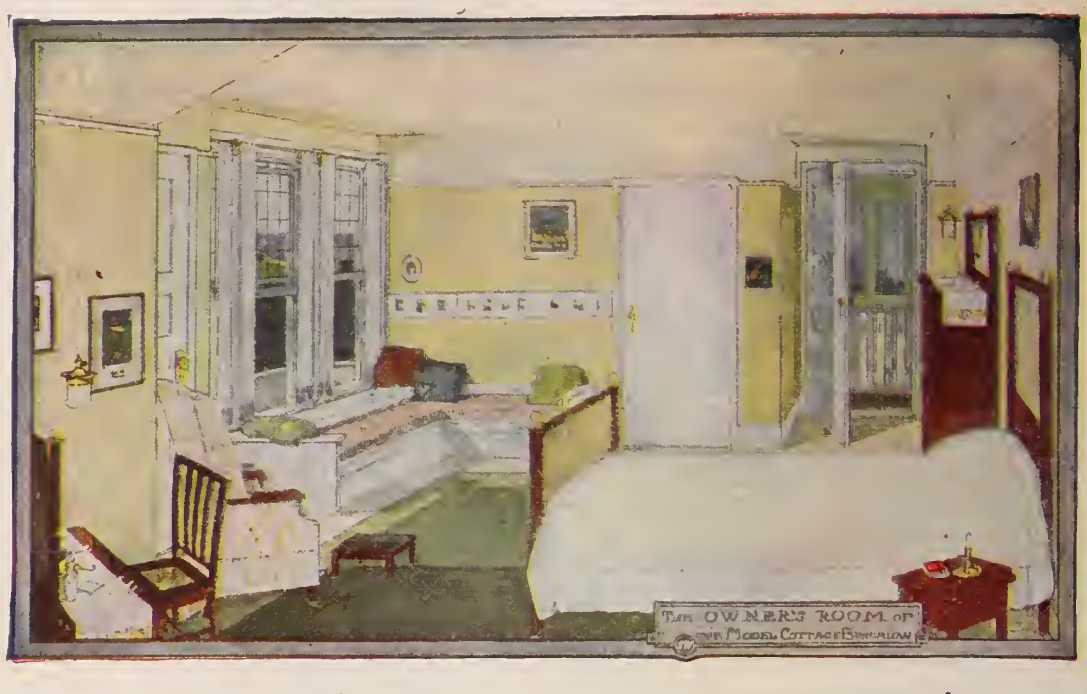
Send at once for our free portfolio: "Color Schemes for Exterior House Painting", with twelve plates in color and complete specifications for painting.

A Stencil Book Free

THIS book gives full instructions for stenciling, suggests color schemes, gives illustrations of designs already cut, tells how to select fabrics which give best results and how to use the Sherwin-Williams' Stencil Colors.

Every woman can make her home far more artistic and beautiful in every particular if she knows how to stencil.

Write today for this free book.



You can make your rooms as attractive as this. Send for the Sherwin-Williams' Cottage Bungalow Portfolio which tells how. It is sent free.

AN accurate and carefully thought-out color scheme for each room of this model bungalow is reproduced in color in this Portfolio which will be sent free on request.

There are also several suggestions for painting the outside of the cottage bungalow, as well as for planting the grounds. Suggestions for furniture, hangings and rugs are included.

This plan is so complete that you can do one of two things:

1. Adapt all of these color schemes to your present house, getting equally good effects.

2. Build this Cottage Bungalow, if you wish, and carry out the entire plan exactly.

The purpose of this Portfolio, however, is to suggest practicable, workable color schemes and durable, satisfactory materials for carrying them out.

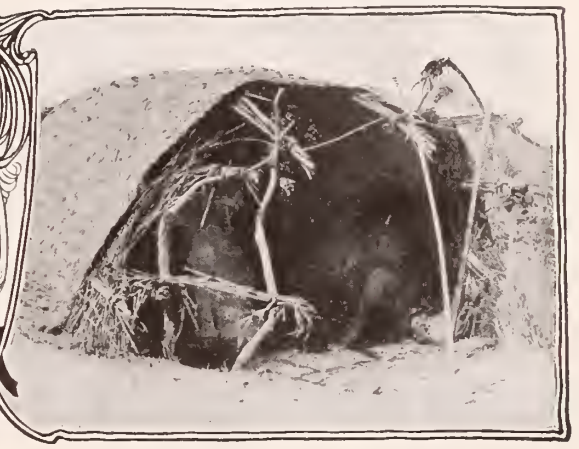
THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

A WEEKLY ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE FOR THE HOME

Carriage in which Prof. Banks Crossed the Desert

Traditional Tomb of Abraham

Huts of Arab Workmen at Bismya



ACROSS THE GREAT ARABIAN DESERT

By PROF. E. J. BANKS

It would sound strange to the ears of most people to be told that the least known portion of the earth is the old Bible land of Arabia. It is, however, true that the land which many scholars believe was the home of the Hebrews before they reached the plain of Shinar, and which at different times has been the seat of great civilizations, is now the darkest part of the earth, darker even than any portion of Africa. Though Arabia is a Bible land, and there Bible customs continue unchanged, little apart from the coast line has been thoroughly explored.

In size Arabia is an immense country, for it is as large as all of the United States east of the Mississippi River, or larger than all of the countries of Europe combined, with the exception of Russia and Scandinavia. In that country, almost without rivers, and until recently without railroads, and where the only ship which sails over the great desert sea is the camel, plodding along at scarcely more than two miles an hour, it is a journey of eighty days along the Red Sea coast from Suez to Aden, or it is a journey of forty days from the Red Sea to the Persian Gulf, or to follow about the coast line of the country, as an Arab sometimes does, it is a journey of an entire year.

While travelers have frequently penetrated the desert south of Palestine, or crossed its northern part from Damascus to Bagdad, but two or three explorers have succeeded in reaching the city of Mecca, and the South Arabian city of Sana, which was the home of the Queen of Sheba. As yet no Christian has succeeded in traversing the land from the north to the south, from Damascus or Bagdad to Aden. Arabia, then, presents a field for exploration more extensive, more promising in valuable results, and perhaps more dangerous, than any other portion of the world.

It is the general impression that the Arabian desert is a vast sea of sand. This is erroneous, for the surface of the greater part of it is almost as hard and as smooth as a floor. While along the western and southern coasts there are barren, rocky ranges raising their peaks to the height of 9,000 feet, most of the interior is a level plain of great fertility; it is a desert simply because of the lack of irrigation. After the hard rains of winter vegetation springs forth, and the dry places then resemble a flower garden. Yet water may be found in nearly every part of the desert by digging to a sufficient depth, and here and there it comes to the surface, forming an oasis about which a cluster of date palms grows and provides shade for the desert traveler.

It is in the larger of the oases, or in the wadies or dry river beds, that the desert encampments are generally fixed. There are, however, in Central Arabia, where but two or three white men have ever been, parts of the desert which are sandy. There the sand is of a reddish or orange color, and lies in belts many miles in width. Drifting like snow, it shifts its position during every wind storm.

As if to recompense the desert dweller for the poverty of the parched plains and sandy wastes, nature has provided him with the strange mirage, which is visible in nearly every part of the desert. Beautiful lakes with wooded shores, tree-covered mountains, villages and men and animals are seen upon the desert horizon, where the Arabs know that only desert can exist. Sometimes the images appear inverted in the sky, and the men and animals and houses are upside down. Nature, too, has provided a way to determine whether the image is real or not, for by raising or lowering the head the distant picture will at once assume a different shape; the men may then become trees, and the houses become hills, yet still the mirage seems so real that the Arabs, who are accustomed to seeing it daily, are frequently deceived by it.

It seems strange that in the desert, especially among the tribal encampments, there are inns or lodging places provided for travelers. Along the lonely pilgrim routes leading to the sacred cities there are large khans to protect the traveler from the heat of summer and the rains of winter, and from the roving bands of thieves. They are generally large open enclosures with alcoves arranged along the inner sides of the walls to serve as lodging places. Apart from the alcoves and a low platform upon which the pilgrims may pray, and the desert well, the inn presents few conveniences, for in Arabia every one carries with him his bed and cooking utensils; but on the other hand, there is no charge for passing the night in the desert hotel.

Every encampment, even of the wandering Arabs, possesses a guest tent, where the stranger is always welcome. The mudif, as it is called, is like the other tents, excepting in size, and to it the traveler, upon arriving, makes his way. Stopping before it, he gives his horse to an attendant, sticks his long spear into the ground at the tent entrance, and leaving his sandals without, enters and salutes and squats on the ground to wait until some of the bitter Arab coffee is served to him. By tasting the coffee he has accepted the hospitality of the sheik, and has become a temporary member of the tribe. There he may remain for a certain time, eating of the food which the sheik must provide him, and, protected by the Arabs, he may wander about their territory at will and in perfect safety. Thus in whatever part of the inhabited desert one may travel, one will always find shelter, and in most places also food.

A SERMON BY

Rev. Charles M. Sheldon, D.D.*

The Lordship of Jesus

TEXT—Col. 1:18

"That he [Christ] in all things may stand first."

THE purpose of Christianity may be stated in a sentence to be the conquest of the entire world of human conduct. "God so loved the world." "I have come that they may have Life." "Come to me, all you who are toiling and burdened." "Whether then you eat or drink, or whatever you do, do everything to the honor of God"—these statements, with a multitude of others like them, represent the purpose of Christ in human history. Nothing less than the entire regeneration of the entire human race for the life which now is and the life which is to come.

The Lordship of Jesus over all human life rests upon two great facts: First. He is the only divine Saviour from human sin. Among all the sons of men, Jesus is the only one through whom men may find the Father. "For there is no other in the whole world who has been named to men as the only means of our salvation." Other figures in history are inspiration to us on account of great personal qualities of leadership or genius or even character; but no one among all the men and women of history is the Saviour from sin but Jesus only. This gives Jesus authority over human life everywhere. His power to save has been witnessed in so many cases in all generations and among all human races that it may be taken for granted. That power is the same to-day as at any time, and Jesus is "Lord of all," as we sing in the old hymn, because He is the Saviour of all.

When Jesus Enters the Heart

Second. The Lordship of Jesus over all life is due, in the second place, to his power of developing life. The moment Jesus enters a life, that life begins to expand and grow. A Christian mechanic is the best mechanic possible. The Christian artist is the best artist. The Christian musician is the best musician; not always, perhaps, in technical ability, but in the results upon human society. Everywhere that Christ really comes into human life he carries the expansion of all human energies. He is the energizer of human effort. His Lordship is shown, not in theory, but in actual fact, in the daily life that men daily live in all forms of human activity. Christian art is different from pagan art in its application to human need. The Greek may have made better statues than can be made to-day, but the use of Greek art when compared with the use of Christian art discloses at once the difference between the two. For example, it never occurred to the pagan artist to go into the slums of Rome or Athens, select the most miserable from the slaves or the outcasts and invite them up to his beautiful palace to look at his beautiful statue and enjoy it, tell them about its beauty and open their eyes to a world unknown to them. But to-day Christian art gathers out of its homes and palaces its beautiful pictures or statues and takes them into the slums of East London, and then invites the lowest and most desperately poor and depraved to come and see some of the beautiful things that men have made. The pagan made beautiful things for himself or out of the love of his art. The true Christian makes beautiful things in order that they may be consecrated to human needs, to minister to human happiness in places where otherwise they could not be enjoyed.

Nominal Christians

The fact that Jesus is not allowed to stand first in all things, as he has a right to stand, accounts for what we call nominal Christianity. Nominal Christianity is a result of only partial acceptance of the Lordship of Jesus. The attempt to let Jesus rule a part of the individual life, or a part of the business life, or a part of the political life, always results in nominal Christianity. This means sectarianism in the Church. It means hypocrisy in business. It means blind partisanship in politics. It means compounding with conscience in matters of amusement. The denial of Jesus as having right to first place in any department of human energy results in a crippled, undeveloped humanity. It is the same as saying that we will not have this Man to rule over us except in places where it is convenient, or where we shall not lose any money or popularity, instead of living according to the command, "Do all things to the glory of God." Nominal Christianity says, "Do as much as you can to the glory of God, if it does not require too much loss, or too much unpopularity or too great sacrifice." On this account many in our churches are not really disciples of the Lord, because they are trying to obey him or follow him in some things, and disobey him in others. We translate the verse, "The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof," like this: "The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof, all except my corner lot, and that is mine." On this account men have said the Golden Rule could not work in business or in politics, thereby denying the Lordship of Jesus everywhere. They have said, "Let Jesus stand first in the prayer meeting, and in the home, and in the Church, and in the marriage relation; but there is no place for him first in making money, in battling in politics, or in conducting the affairs of the nation."

The failure to put Jesus in the first place in all human activity is a concession to the power of sin. I have heard ministers in a great city say, "It is of no use for us to speak out against the great political corruption, against the reign of vice here, because it will do no good. These things have come to stay." Many Christians who realize the demoralizing effect of the saloon and the gambling house keep silent about them because, they say, "we cannot do anything." This is the same as saying that sin is more powerful than Christ. It is giving way to the powers of evil because we think nothing can be done. But the real Christian, who believes in the supremacy of Jesus everywhere, declares that, whether anything can be done or not, it is always the duty of the Christian disciple to bear witness to the truth, to speak with the prophet's voice, whether he thinks it will do any good or not.

The Glorifying Presence

There is no place where Jesus is not needed. Take any human situation known to the race, and it is impossible to conceive of any condition whatever which Jesus cannot enter to bless, to develop, to strengthen. The man who is in perfect health, surrounded by friends, gifted with genius, will find all his joy intensified and rightly defined, if he lets Jesus into his life to share it all with him. The man who stands overwhelmed with sorrow, trouble, accident, disease, poverty, will find in the Lord Jesus Christ the only real strength great enough to carry him through all trouble. The sin of the world has no sufficient master outside of Jesus. Education, culture, wealth, power cannot remove sin. The hour of birth is glorified by the presence of Jesus in the home. The hour of death is transfigured by the same presence of him who overcame the last great enemy. All conditions of human environment caused by the accident of birth or family or position, all conditions of earthly relations of men with one another, are unable to take the power of Jesus by surprise. He is equal to all of them, and he is necessary to all of them. There is no possible event in the life of individuals or nations out of which Christ can be thrust with any safety. He belongs to all, because he is the Life of all.

The salvation of the Republic depends upon obedience to Christ. There is not one law for nations and another for individuals. Jesus is Lord of all. The great problems that vex the race, no matter what they may be called or where they may be found, have no solution apart from the great Life-Giver. It is a false thought of Jesus and all his teachings to confine his power to what we call religious things. All things are religious that have to do with human conduct. Railroads ought to run to the glory of God just as well as Sunday Schools. The building of cities, steamboats, public highways, the housing and clothing of the multitude, the opening of new physical territory for human life, the expansion of a republic in its education, its invention, its culture, are all a part of the working out of the kingdom of God upon the earth. Jesus has a right to stand first in all these things, just as much as he has a right to stand first in the sanctuary of the home life or the prayer life of the nation or the individual. To deny the Lordship of Jesus in any department of human activity is to deny his preeminence. We have no "Lord of all" if we shut him out of any part of our human energy. The moment we attempt to do it we set ourselves up on the throne of Lordship by the side of Jesus; rather, we dethrone him, and put ourseves as usurpers in his place.

Saviour, Keeper, Revealer, Developer

The purpose of Christianity is four-fold. (a) Christ saves the world. He is the universal Saviour of mankind. Salvation is not caused by works; works are caused by salvation. Jesus stands first because he is able to save. (b) Christ not only saves the race; he keeps it. He is the ever-living force in the life which makes it grow. The Christ which snatches out of ruin is able to build up a life habitation. (c) Jesus not only saves and keeps, but he reveals. Life is a new thing to the Christian. "Old definitions are passed away. Behold, all things have new definitions!" History is a new thing to the Christian. He reads it as he never read it before. Business is a new thing. Politics is transfigured by the new definition. All things are under the sweep of a new energy, and once Jesus is Master in the life, he reveals God the Father to man, reveals men to one another, and he reveals a man's own soul to himself. (d) Jesus not only saves and keeps and reveals, when he is placed first in the life, but he develops it. The test of the ages proves this: that nothing so enlarges the soul as the acknowledgment of the mastery of Jesus in the life. The ignorant fisherman lived with Jesus a few months and became a great apostle. The unlearned disciple helped to found a new empire in the world. Friendship with Jesus develops all latent powers of the heart and mind.

Thus we have in him who stands first of all, the Saviour, the Keeper, the Revealer, the Life-Giver. If Jesus is once acknowledged by the Church, by the nominal Christians, as entitled to first place in everything that men do, it will be the beginning of the next great religious revolution around the world.

All hail the power of Jesus' name!
Let angels prostrate fall;
Bring forth the royal diadem,
And crown him Lord of all!

Not Lord of a few things, but of everything. Not Lord of the inner life alone, but of the outward life as well. Let the whole earth sing this song in the light of our text. He is Lord of all, and this is "because it pleased God that the divine nature, all its fulness, should dwell in Christ, and it also pleased God to reconcile all things to himself through him—to reconcile to himself, I say, through Christ, all things both on earth and in heaven."

Of High Merit

Dear Mr. Editor: I received the beautiful "Dreamland calendar, also the "Daughters of Decatur." They are surely pictures of high artistic merit. I am well pleased, and will help to brighten some other home by giving one of them away. Thank you very much, and wishing you success,

GIVE YOUR SUNSHINE TO THE LIVING

By Mrs. Mary B. Wingate

GIVE your sunshine to the living,
Do not wait till they are dead;
Oh, there's joy in constant giving,
Human hearts are comforted,
And the giver feels the sunshine
Of the heart's responsive smile,
Knowing that another's pathway
Has been brightened all the while.

Give your blossoms to the living;
Let them have their fragrance now;
Ere their eyes are sealed in slumber
And like marble is their brow.
Often for some loving token
Human hearts have ached and bled;
Give your blossoms to the living,
Do not wait till they are dead.

Give your sunshine to the lonely,
Though they seem but cold and proud;
Oft, perchance, some hidden sorrow
Makes them shun the cheerful crowd.
Give a loving word or token,
Just a pressure of the hand;
Let them know your heart is tender,
Though you may not understand.

Give your heart's love to the fallen;
Oh, they need the tenderest care!
Though you see not their temptation,
They must meet it everywhere.
Oft a word, a smile, a handclasp,
Gives the needed strength and cheer;
Helps them in the bitter conflict,
When the tempter lingers near.

Give your sunshine to the living;
Scatter flowers with eager hand;
You may wake a chord responsive
That will vibrate o'er the land.
Lavish smiles upon the aged;
Cheer the sad ones on their way;
You can make this world an Eden
By the kindness of to-day.

Strange Fishes

THERE is a fish in India which can climb. Therefore it is called the climbing perch,—though, in point of fact, it is not a perch at all, according to the marks of our American perch.

This singular creature has a little cistern of water in its head, so that the awful droughts which often afflict its native country have no terrors for it. When the little fresh-water pool in which it lives dries up in the summer, as it often does for days or even weeks at a time, this queer fish stays alive by means of the water in its head. "Water on the brain," which kills human beings, keeps the climbing perch alive.

"But," you ask, "why is it called a 'climbing perch'?"

Because it can walk by means of its lower fins; and it can also hitch along by means of its side fins.

Sometimes when its home-pool dries up, it burrows into the mud and lies there torpid until the rains refill its little lake.

Others seem to prefer to shuffle along overland until they find another pool.

It used to be said that these fishes climbed cocoanut palm trees in quest of the milk. One reliable witness testified that he caught one on the stem of a tree five feet from the ground.

Another strange fish is the mud-skipper of Burmah and West Africa. It can stay in water only a little while at a time, or else it will drown. On the other hand, it cannot stay long on the land. It seems to be compelled to take a dip in the river once in every few minutes.

These fish have queer, telescopic eyes, which they poke out of their heads and turn about in a truly startling way. On the whole, they look more like tadpoles than fish.

When they are tired they prop themselves up on their fins much as a man rests his elbows on a table.

REST DAY

By Rev. J. M. Farrar, D.D.*

AFTER Labor Day we look for Rest Day. Juniors should be thankful for their day of rest. Admiral Hall, of the British Navy, commanded a naval vessel at Hong-Kong. After divine service had been performed one Sunday on his ship and the sailors were at rest, his intelligent Chinese pilot said: "Your Joss [God] is better than our Joss, for he gives you holiday and rest one day in seven, and we have only one day in the year, on New Year's Day."

The Admiral, in a recent address to workingmen, told them of this remark, and added: "Just picture working hard from morning till night for 364 days and only one day of rest; and then prize that Sabbath!"

IN my "brain-box" I find a number of good stories about Rest Day. I have selected for my Juniors this story by H. Thomas:

The Peach Lesson

As a long-drawn sigh escaped her young guest Mrs. Grant said: "A penny for your thoughts, Harry."

"Well, I'll own right up. I was thinking how much nicer it would be if the Sunday were left out of the week; it seems to spoil everything so."

"Spoil everything! Why, Harry, I think it the best day of all the week," said Mrs. Grant, trying not to look shocked at his words.

"Oh, well, that's because you're grown up, I suppose. But I almost hate Sunday; it puts a stop to all my nice times."

"Harry, I haven't seen you for a week. Tell me how you have spent it."

"Well, let me see," answered Harry, thoughtfully. "It's the last week of vacation, and I've crowded it with fun. Monday we boys had a ball game with some of the West Side boys, and our side beat. Tuesday I had more fun yet. Six of us boys went over in the grove and camped out. We fished, and cooked our own meals, and had heaps of fun! We stayed until Thursday night."

"I'M so glad you enjoyed yourself. Now for the two days more."

"Well, Friday just beat all the other days for fun. Our Sabbath School went out to the lake and had just the nicest time! We had everything good to eat you can think of; played games, rowed on the water, and—and—oh, dear! the day wasn't half long enough. And to-day has been just as nice as the rest of the week. We boys made some big kites, and you just ought to see what fun we've had flying them!"

Mrs. Grant excused herself and went to the garden, where she picked seven of the most beautiful Crawford peaches she could find.

Harry's eyes danced with delight as she entered the room holding them in her hand, saying: "Harry, I have selected for you seven of my finest peaches; they are all yours. You can, if you choose, eat all of them; but if, after you have eaten six, you will carry the seventh to the poor sick boy at the foot of the hill, and give it to him, it will make me very happy."

"WHY, Auntie Grant," said Harry, "what sort of a boy do you take me for? Of course I shall take it to Dick—the very nicest one, too."

"Well, let us imagine that after you have eaten six peaches you say, 'Oh, dear! I suppose I must give the last peach to Dick; but I hate to.'"

"I won't even imagine such a thing!" interrupted Harry with a very red face. "It isn't in me to be so mean!"

Mrs. Grant made answer by taking the plate of peaches into her own hand, and saying impressively: "Here are seven peaches. They remind me of a boy who had seven beautiful gifts. The Giver said in giving them, 'They are yours; but if you love me you will do me honor by setting one apart as sacred to my memory.' Did the boy regard the wishes of the Giver as sacred, and gladly obey them?"

"It would be a mean sort of a boy that wouldn't do that much for a generous friend," ventured Harry.

"It would seem so," said Mrs. Grant. Then taking up one of the peaches she continued: "We will, for the sake of illustration, call this Monday; that's the day he played ball, and came off victorious. Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday he camped out, and 'fun' marked every one of them. Friday, picnic day, not half long enough. Saturday, kite-flying and a full tide of enjoyment."

MRS. GRANT had pointed to one peach after another in naming them, but had avoided looking at Harry. Had she done so she would have seen that the lesson was striking home; for the boy's face was growing crimson. At last only one peach remained unnamed. Taking it up, she said, "You are Sunday, and I almost hate you, because you spoil my nice times!"

There was an instant's silence and then Harry in a repentant tone said: "Oh, Auntie Grant, I see it! I have often made my boast that with all my faults I was at least generous; but now I see how easy it is to be selfish and not know it."

"I am glad to see my peach lesson has made you see yourself," said Mrs. Grant, looking pleased.

"It has, for a fact. Six days for fun ought to satisfy any boy, and I don't think any one will ever again hear me say I hate Sunday."

TWO PREACHERS

THE preacher was young and of noble mien;
The truths that he uttered were well expressed;
The graces of speech—learned in school—could be seen
In his gestures, his voice and his pose at rest;
But he heard, as he passed by a half-closed door—
"Such preaching as that cuts no ice with me."

Another man preached from the sacred desk,
In accents uncultured; with gestures rude,
He told of his own fearful struggles with sin,
Of God's love, of repentance, of hope renewed;
And he heard this prayer, through that half-closed door—
"God help a lost sinner; God help even me."

Not Collected

LITTLE Harry lived in the country and never saw a city letter-box until he was six years old. Then he visited an aunt in Cincinnati.

"What is the box for on the lamp-post?" he asked.

"To put letters in."

"What happens to the letters?"

"A postman comes and collects them."

Harry was at his aunt's for two or three days and often dropped letters in the box, but it so chanced that he did not see any postman in the act of collecting them.

When he returned home, he made a letter-box himself. He was occupied several days in doing it and it did not look much like a regular letter-box, after all, but it gave great satisfaction to Harry. He nailed it tightly to a post near the road, and at once printed a little letter himself and dropped it in his box.

The next day his sister gave him a letter to post, and instead of running down to the village post office with it, he dropped it into his box.

During the next few weeks many letters were given to Harry to post, and he dropped them all into his box. In a month it was full, and letters were sticking out from the top.

Then the family started an investigation. By means of it several mysteries were solved. They discovered why certain letters had not been answered; why people who had been invited had not come nor sent word; and why Harry had been so remarkably quick about posting letters.

Harry's letter-box was banished, much to his grief; and a course of spirited lectures was delivered to him by every one of the older members of his family, upon the United States postal system. Now when he is given a letter to post, he is watched until he is well down the road to the village post office.

A Tribute to Mont-Lawn

MANY friends of our Children's Home in different parts of the country, write us very interesting letters concerning the work. In Tyrone, Pa., a number of these friends have organized the "Sinking Valley Mont-Lawn Society," Miss L. B. Tussey, president, and are now supporting a cot at our Children's Home in memory of their Sunday School Superintendent, John L. Mingle, who passed away May 30, and who had faithfully served the Sinking Valley Union Sunday School for eight years. Miss Tussey in behalf of the society send this Mont-Lawn acrostic, showing what each letter stands for:

M is for Mont-Lawn, whose praises we sing;
O for the Outings the Saturdays bring;
N for Nyack, where the children all land;
T for the Temple, so peaceful and grand;
L for the Lawn, where they all love to play;
A for the air here, so healthful, they say;
W for the Wagon, that carries so many;
N is for Noon, when they march to Fort Plenty;
C for the Chimes, that call sweetly to prayer;
H for the Helpers, so kind and so fair;
I for Improvements, made new every year;
L for the Lodge, which they all hold so dear;
D is for Dormitories, quiet and neat;
R for the Romping, with riotous feet;
E is for Evening, when little eyes close;
N for the Nursery, where babies repose;
S for the Sandpiles, made fresh every year;
H for the Homestead, so full of good cheer;
O for Old Glory, unfurled to the sky;
M for the Money we'll give till we die;
E for Each of us loving Mont-Lawn.

THE WORLD'S PEACE CONGRESS

IT was held in Stockholm, Sweden, and lasted five days—August 1-5. Stockholm is one of the most beautiful cities of the world. It has been called "the Venice of the North." It is told that it covers one thousand islands. The Peace Congress was given a generous welcome by the city authorities; large flags of all nations were put up along the quay; a special guide book was issued in dainty style; the museums were opened free to delegates; a special excursion was made to Saltsjobaden, a famous seaside resort, with a dinner at the Grand Hotel there (four hundred and eighty covers were laid). The city also gave its best in meeting places for the Congress; in the famous and beautiful Riddarhuset during the day, and in the evenings, the large hall of the Musical Academy.

It should be said that the Riddarhuset is a sort of club-house or palace for the nobility, the walls of the chamber where the Congress met being adorned with the coats-of-arms of Sweden's "first families." There were invitations issued by the king in royal style on elegant cards for the members of the Congress to attend a party in the Logarden, the royal gardens. The day, however, proving rainy, a reception was held in the king's palace, Prince Karl, the brother of the king, receiving the guests, as the king himself was absent from the city. A royal feast was spread for all who came.

The personnel of the Congress was most interesting, as distinguished men and women of many nations were present. The officers of the Congress were these: Hon. President, Comte Arvid Taube; President, Baron Carl Carlson Bonde; General Secretary, M. Johan Bergman, Ph.D. The published list of delegates represents about two hundred peace organizations and other bodies. There were some delegates from labor organizations and from the Roman Catholic Church. For the first time there were delegates from Russian peace societies, also one from Turkey: Riza Achmed Bey, President of the Chamber of Deputies in Constantinople.

The work of the Congress was outlined by commissions, and brought forward in resolutions, always in French, but translated into English and German by regular interpreters. The speeches which followed were also interpreted in brief. Any delegate, man or woman, was free to speak on the subject under consideration, and there was no time limit. A small blackboard hung from the desk where all speakers must stand, and on it the name of the person speaking was written, and the subject being discussed. A box stood at the side of the desk in which speakers were requested to place copies of what they had said.

"Disarmament of Nations" was the greatest subject discussed by the Congress. It was agreed that universal, obligatory and permanent arbitration should be decided upon at the Third Hague Court. Dr. Benjamin F. Trueblood quoted Colonel Roosevelt as having said that "if all governments were sincere there ought to be no obstacle in the way." It was suggested that there should be a universal referendum among the nations on the subject.

One speaker said: "Let one or two large Powers have courage to disarm, and smaller Powers will quickly follow." There was universal approbation of this expression.

One speaker sent to represent the largest labor union in the world says the time will soon come when there will be a general international strike against war "because the civilized world could not exist under this sickening war craze." He also said it would be better settled by reason than by force, but that labor societies were ready and willing to take up the matter if peace societies could not bring it about. He said: "Pray God an outburst of labor on this matter shall not be necessary."

The Royal Palace, Stockholm, Sweden

It was urged by another speaker that military experts should not have votes at the Hague Conference. It was asserted that military men have an increasing dislike for peace organizations. Another speaker said that humane people in Germany were very much interested in disarmament, and the idea had made much progress during the past year. The German government was willing to take disarmament under consideration.

A letter was received from the French foreign office stating that that government would co-operate with the Third Hague Conference. The prominence of the United States in peace matters was spoken of many times, one speaker saying: "The Un States has too long given us the model, and i time the Old World were waking up." This wa reference to the fact that the United States G ernment had taken the initiative in calling the S ond Hague Conference and has also issued the for the third.

An argument was made by M. Gaston Moch military man but an advocate of peace, for "' Right of Legitimate Defense." In response to hi was said: "If we pass M. Moch's proposition, all militarists of the world will quote the license to issued by the International Peace Congress a complete vindication of their own operations." was also said: "The essential task of the pe movement is to increase the faith of men and nati in pacific methods of settling disputes. When a nation wants to go to war, or is driven to war necessity, it will not require any license from The masses of people throughout Europe not o do not want to go to war, do not want to bear the wei of the machinery of war." Moch's proposition did not ceive the endorsement of Congress, but was sidetrac by voting to take up the p vious question.

There was considerable cussion about the desirabil of the Peace Congress taki up the grievances of classes people, as the Jews in Russ the Armenians in Turkey, case of Finland, etc. T Congress was almost equa divided on this point, but fina agreed to do so, whereupon t Russian delegates said th must be excused from taki part while the affairs of th government were being d cussed. On the other hand, request from the delegate fr Egypt asked that a message sympathy be sent to his peo and that on next year's p gramme there should be giv time for the discussion of t difficulty between England and Egypt.

It was decided to hold the next World's Pea Congress in Rome in October of 1911. The Co gress of 1914 was jointly invited by Mrs. Jol Miller Horton of Buffalo, N. Y., and Dr. Benjam F. Trueblood to hold session in the United Stat that they might participate in the celebration of o of the greatest peace events of the world—the co summation of one hundred years of peace betwe the United States and Canada.

The last act of the delegates to the Peace Congre was to carry a large wreath of oak leaves, fasten with the Swedish national colors, to the chur where lie the remains of King Oscar and lay upon his tomb, as the friend of peace.

THE BRUSSELS EXPOSITION AFTER THE GREAT FIRE

IN last week's CHRISTIAN HERALD an account was published of the great fire which swept the grounds of the Brussels International Exposition, destroying many of the beautiful buildings and bringing sorrow and dismay to the hearts of the Belgian people, who were naturally proud of their "White City." The photographs above show the present appearance of some of the buildings. In other parts of the Exposition, however, the flames did still more destructive work, making a clean sweep and leaving a level ruin over acres that were formerly covered with magnificent structures. The picturesque "Midway" wa literally razed to the ground. The Belgian section suffered heavily, and so als did the French, the German and the Dutch sections; but the Belgian people a urging forward the work of reconstruction and there is hope that the "Whi City," finer and more attractive than before, may soon again command th admiration of Europe. The total loss by the fire was from $10,000,000 t $15,000,000.

THE FIRE-SWEPT NORTHWEST

A Lumber Team in the Bitter Root Forest Preserve

Part of Taft, Montana, Which Has Been Burned

VERY summer some parts of the country suffer to some extent from forest fires, but those which have raged through the woods of ntana, Washington and Idaho during the past f weeks have made these periodical conflagrations sm insignificant affairs. The loss in property at very conservative estimate is between three and f r millions, while the loss of life is probably sev- el hundred. At least seven towns were burned the map, while about twenty ers were in danger of destruc- n and were lucky to escape with y the destruction of a few houses. national forest preserves were fire at the same time, Crater ke, Bitter Root, Clearwater, Mis- la, Cœur d' Alene and Cabinet. was man against the fiery ele- nt in a long and hard battle, and n for a time seemed the loser. rest rangers and volunteer fire- hters fought heroically to save eatened districts and towns, and e up their lives by the score in unequal contest.

United States troops were or- ed to the burning districts by sident Taft and again the lads their brown service suits added v laurels to the service. The r Department also sent pack ins with medical supplies and a ce of army surgeons. One of worst facts in connection with fires is that the Forestry De- tment has found that they are incendiary origin, especially in gon.

On the 20th and 21st of August fires swept over the Cœur lene region in Idaho, and eighty ple lost their lives. Most of these were fire- hters. Over thirty were burned at Big Creek, d nearly an equal number on Superior Lake. The mes in two days laid the entire country from llace to St. Joe River in ashes. It seemed for a e as if Wallace itself was doomed. Here and re a building caught from the drifting, suffocating cloud of smoke and ashes, and before the fire swept off in another direction one hundred buildings were but smoking ruins.

The hospitals were crowded with wounded, and many cases of burns were treated at home. Reports came in for days of a party here and there in the woods that had perished in the conflagration. One report had it that over a hundred perished on the St. Joe River, but fortunately it proved untrue.

Types of Miners and Lumbermen in Taft

Almost by a miracle all but four made good their escape.

Northwestern Montana was driven to desperation. The whole forest seemed afire and it swept down over Deborgia, Henderson and Taft, and burned them to the ground. Part of St. Regis was also food for flames. Thousands of men battled recklessly against the fire, starting back fires, chopping down brush, digging trenches and using every other expedient which has been tried to stop a forest fire. But they were beaten. Those who could escaped to creeks and rivers and plunged in to the neck to escape the intense heat. In one place the fire in Montana extended in an unbroken line of fifty miles. Several towns were threatened at this writing and their safety is not yet assured. Rain seems to be their only salvation. The loss of life was undoubtedly very heavy. A great many of the fighters were blinded. Falling trees proved a great source of danger, legs and arms being broken by the branches when the fighters had got too near to the burning timber.

The rapidity with which flames spread is well illustrated by what occurred in one town where a man was endeavoring to bury two trunks containing his household valuables. The flames suddenly darted around the corner of his house and burned him from head to foot. Some of the fire-fighters had every shred of their clothing burned off and their recovery is doubtful.

The country about Newport, State of Washington, was also burned out, and a number of farmers lost their lives. One of the most thrilling escapes yet reported is that of a large party of fire-fighters and refugees who were cornered by the flames but found an old mine shaft into which they plunged and were safe until the flames had exhausted their fury and passed on.

On account of the fires in the Northwest precautions are being taken in all our great forest districts to prevent similar conflagrations and fire-wardens and citizens will not breathe easily until the dry season is past. Campers and hunters have to receive permission from rangers or fire-wardens to start fires and must see that they are carefully extinguished. Residents of forest districts are also drafted as extra wardens.

Travel in the desert is always accompanied with nger from the roving, thieving bands. Only if e has nothing worthy of stealing can he be safe, d therefore one may meet Arabs partly covered th rags and on foot traveling from one part of e desert to another. Long journeys of a month more, as from Damascus to Bagdad, are some- nes made by donkey, a beast which is despised in abia and hardly considered worth stealing. If e travels by horse or by camel it is generally in mpany with a large well-armed party, able to e with any wandering band.

The horse is used almost exclusively wherever ter can be found with sufficient frequency, and has been trained to continue for thirty-six hours more without drinking, but the camel is the only imal which may penetrate the driest regions. e dromedary is capable of going about ten miles hour for sixteen hours a day, while the poorer last moves along slowly from two to three miles an ur.

Over the great desert highway from Damascus to gdad there is a camel post, and for ten days, with t a single desert well on the way where one may ench his thirst, the dromedary carries the Turkish mail. The postman, riding eighteen hours a day, is able to sleep on his animal by sitting behind the hump, which he uses as his pillow, and leaving his feet to hang down behind.

The people of Central Arabia are the same pure Arabs as those who have lived there for 6,000 years, or as far back as history reaches.

The Arabs are divided into hundreds of different tribes. Each is independent and governed by a sheik whose office is hereditary, and who has absolute authority over his people, settling their disputes, selecting the location of their camp, collecting from them his tribute money, and in return providing them with food whenever necessity compels them to ask it. Though Arabia is generally supposed to be a part of the Turkish Empire, few of the sheiks recognize the Sultan. About the only higher power which they acknowledge is the unwritten desert law, "An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth."

The dress of the Arabs is as unchangeable as the other desert customs. The under garment is merely a long shirt, while the aba, a large square tunic, which is possibly the seamless garment of the New Testament, is the dress suit of all great occasions. At one season of the year it is a blanket, and at another it is the bed. Upon the head is a square cloth, called the kefier, which developed into the turban of the town Arabs, and upon the feet are sandals of the ancient fashion.

The desert Arab obtains his livelihood by camel raising, and in the great central plateau one may find him herding thousands of camels. Once a year the camels are driven to market to the larger cities, like Bagdad, Damascus or Aden, to be sold to the merchants whose caravans still transport the merchandise from one end of the desert to another.

Nominally the religion of the desert is Mohammedanism, and though Mohammed was an Arab, and the Arabian city of Mecca is the centre of the Mohammedan world, the desert Arab is more or less of a pagan. He calls himself a Mohammedan, yet he seldom prays or fasts, or goes upon the pilgrimage to Mecca, as a good Moslem should.

Such are the Arabs of the real desert to-day, and such have they been during all of the centuries since Hebrew history began. Hebrew customs of Bible days were largely influenced by them, and so now ancient Bible customs may be better understood by studying, not the Arabs of Palestine or of Egypt, but the wandering tribes of Central Arabia, where Western civilization and influence have not yet gone.

Vacation Results

WITH the second week of September the vacation season is practically over, except for those few whose pocketbooks are of the requisite fulness to permit them to wander from resort to resort as long as they wish, for whom the world at large is but a playground, and to whom a trip to Europe is but "a dash across the pond." The great majority of vacationists, however, are glad to get two weeks to forget the grind at the desk or in the shop which is their lot for fifty weeks of the year. It is the short-term vacationists who increase the business of the railroads from June till fall and who are the support of hundreds of hotels and boarding houses for the year.

The custom of taking a vacation has been a benefit to employer and employee alike. The two weeks of complete change from the ordinary round of duties and from familiar scenes has a freshening effect on both body and mind, resulting in increased vigor. Physicians have long recognized this, and what has been good for invalids has increased the working efficiency of the man and woman who have no particular cause to worry about their health, and who are as sound as the small boy who said he did not know he had a body unless he ran into something.

One great result of the vacation system is that it broadens the horizon of people who otherwise would get all their knowledge of other parts of the country from books, and one short trip is worth several volumes. The people in the East like to go inland, and a large majority of the sojourners by the sea come from homes in the interior, and with personal acquaintance sectionalism seems childish and un-American. Probably nothing else has done as much to break up selfish local pride as the shifting of the summer traveler from place to place and the discovery that there are people worth knowing on the other side of what was formerly their limited horizon. The vacationist in his trips from one State to another has been unconsciously playing a political role as an agent of national unification, for in small and isolated communities, where the people stay year in and year out, the seeker for recreation comes, bringing with him some of the spirit of the outside world. Both natives and tourists are benefited by personal acquaintance and exchange of opinions and ideas. The vacationist also plays an important part in international relations. The constant ebb and flow of tourist traffic across the Canadian border is undoubtedly one of the main reasons for the very cordial relations now existing between the two countries. Goldsmith in his Citizen of the World showed that he felt this influence of travel in broadening the human heart and causing the feeling to grow that "He hath made of one blood all nations."

The Pacification of Korea

THEY have "yellow journals" in the Orient, too. Now that the annexation of Korea by Japan is a thing accomplished, the last act in the drama having taken place in Seoul, the Korean capital, on August 22, public gatherings have been forbidden and precautionary measures have been taken to avoid public excitement that might lead to open discontent. Several of the Tokyo newspapers have seized the opportunity to revive the old charge—which the late Prince Ito effectually proved to be altogether groundless—that the American missionaries were mainly responsible for Korean opposition to Japan's annexation scheme. These journals go even further and urge that the missionaries should be prohibited hereafter "from talking to the Korean people about the greatness of America." It is only fair to add, however, that this sensational attack, which is inspired by the anti-Christian element in Japan, is disapproved by the leading journals and by people of influence. They knew that the purpose was to make the American missionaries the scapegoat for a condition for which they were nowise responsible. It suited the plans of the heathen element, however, to make it appear that the wonderful progress of Christianity in Korea had a political rather than a religious aspect and that behind each conversion there was an ulterior motive. Meanwhile the sensible portion of the Japanese press deprecate the whole affair and declare that the new government of Korea must strive, by pacific measures and a wise administrative programme, to change the attitude of Korea from hostility to one of friendship. It would be a serious mistake to endeavor by the use of the "iron hand" to inspire confidence and respect in Korea. We believe that wiser and juster counsels will prevail and that Japan will not, by adopting any course based upon sensational clamor and obvious misrepresentation, sully the fair fame she has won before the whole world for justice and magnanimity.

Mont-Lawn's Grateful Children

AS the summer season at our Children's Home at Mont-Lawn nears its close, we cannot refrain from expressing our thanks to the kind friends all over the country who have aided us in making the year a notable one for this beautiful charity. Mont-Lawn was Dr. Klopsch's special favorite among his many benevolences and it was doubtless the desire to pay a tribute to his memory that led so many of our CHRISTIAN HERALD readers to send in their offerings for its maintenance. They have earned the gratitude of three thousand little tenement children who, but for their kindness, would have had no outing this year, and would have been obliged to pass the torrid, sickly midsummer in heated tenements, with no playground but alley or street. Instead, they have heartily enjoyed their vacation at the Children's Paradise and they go back to their humble homes with grateful hearts, to sing to others the sweet songs of the Children's Temple and to tell of the kind patrons who brought so much of pure happiness into their narrow and pinched little lives. May God bless Mont-Lawn, its little guests, and every friend who has had a share in its Christlike work.

Wise and Foolish Stewards

A READER of this journal in New York City sends us this letter:

> You have, on several occasions, remarked in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that the increase in the number of rich men who consider themselves as stewards is noticeable. The man in the enclosed report certainly does not consider himself a steward. Neither are those stewards who figured as victims in the recent raid at the Narragansett Pier; nor the two "preachers" who uphold gambling. All these evidently think that their wealth, however questionably it may have been obtained, is their own, and that they "have a right" to do with it as they please. The same may be said of all who have been caught in the "automobile craze," who go about frightening people with their speed mania and the noise of their horns, and heedlessly killing or injuring victims. It may also be said of the many who would like to be caught in the same craze. Two or three real stewards have been noticed in the newspapers; but the majority of men make money so they can spend it; others, for the power it brings; some, to keep it and to gloat over it. A few make money, and give a small percentage away, posing as philanthropists; but such giving is done merely for the notoriety it brings. There isn't any man, or woman either, for that matter, who can become enormously wealthy by legitimate means.

Although unfortunately it is true that people are frequently shocked by the follies and extravagances of their fellows, these occurrences do not affect the general principle that every sane and responsible human being has a stewardship and an accountability therefor. Further, notwithstanding the exceptions which our reader has somewhat cynically pointed out, the recognition of this great principle of stewardship or responsibility for the use of our means and opportunities, is steadily growing not here alone but all over the civilized globe. More men and women are realizing now than in earlier days that they hold their talents, their money, their possessions in trust and that they owe it as a duty to God and to their fellow-men to use them to the best advantage and not for self-gratification or vain display or for folly and wickedness. Further, the fact that the extravagant indulgences of some of the rich nowadays attract so much attention and excite so much criticism is of itself evidence of the changing attitude of the public mind on the subject. Our people have no plaudits for those who make their wealth a plaything to excite astonishment or to shock propriety by their lavish and reckless use of it. Such careers lead to moral and material ruin. For the man or woman who has acquired wealth honorably, upon whose possessions there is no stain, and who employs all sanely and beneficently, we should have no harsh words of criticism. To this class belong many of the great employers of labor, the men who open up new fields of human activity and who make the wilderness to blossom. In s hands, money may become a means of blessing r the power it brings, the doors of opportunity it n enter and the widespread good it can be made o accomplish.

Roosevelt on Good Citizenship

LIKE a brilliant meteor, leaving a burst of co cations in its wake, Colonel Roosevelt is swe ing across the continent, emanating intellect l sparks and political wisdom as he goes. Fr Oyster Bay to the Pacific, he is scattering eloque e broadcast to large and delighted audiences. s themes take the widest range imagination can sire. From rear platforms, in crowded halls, a in the open with only the cloudless blue canopy o head and the gentle summer zephyrs giving stren and inspiration, the Colonel is telling the Ameri people lots of things he believes they ought to kn The corporations are shaking with apprehensi , the friends of mob lawlessness are getting visi uneasy, and the politicians who have been dere t in their public performances are listening w tensely-drawn ears to the rolling thunder of den ciation. Whatever Roosevelt does, he does well a thoroughly, whether it be in the line of praise censure. His language is always calculated to h the cause of good citizenship. "You can't get right kind of government," he told the Indiana at Elkhart, "unless you have the right kind of c zens back of the government. I don't care how a a man is. If he is not honest he will prove greatest curse to the country. Don't forget that the case with public men as well as with priv citizens. Don't support a man because he is sma because his smartness is of no use without c science. And I don't even care how honest he how game he is, if he has not common sense he is no use." People need to be reminded of these thin and we know of no one so competent to make th remember as Theodore.

Saving the Children

THE hot, sultry summer has made a fearful mortality nearly everywhere, the children, as usual, falling the easiest prey to disease. The ·ath rate of the children in New York City has ·en double that of recent years. The slaughter of ıe little ones has been so great as to excite the ·mpathy and demand the attention of the Depart·ents of Health and of Charities, and of the benevo·nt organizations throughout the city. It was ·etty well agreed that in addition to the unusually ınhealthy summer, the mortality among the chil·en was produced by the want of nutritious food ıd fresh air. The temperature around 90 in the uffy tenement apartments, and the blistering heat ı the outside that cut down strong healthy men in ı instant, greatly reduced the chances of life for e little folks. Agencies for fresh air outings that ere organized were worked to their fullest capa·ty, new ones were created, and an increased num·r of daily excursions was arranged for. The harity Organization Society, the Society for the nprovement of the Condition of the Poor, St. ›hn's Guild, the Tribune Fresh Air Fund, the erald Ice Fund, Miss Helen Gould's extensive fresh r charities, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's ome, and numerous other benevolences, have con·ibuted to the out-of-door beneficence which has ·en such a blessing and salvation to the little chil·en of poverty. The sword of disease has relent·ssly cut down the innocents, and there has been ud and widespread lamentation; ıt Christ, who loved the little ones, ıs filled the hearts of his children ith sympathy and has prompted em to arrest the massacre. The ails of sorrow remind us of those used by the sword of Herod in den times.

In Rama was there a voice heard, lamenta·n, and weeping, and great mourning, achel weeping for her children, and would t be comforted, because they are not. (Matt. 2 : 18.)

›ved by God's Poor

Sympathy for Mayor Gaynor of ew York in his tragic affliction ıs been universal. Political friends ıd foes have vied with each other their expressions of affection for m. Messages of sympathy came om the leading men of the nation, cluding the Governor of his own tate and President Taft, but these essages were not more sincere, r more highly appreciated, than ose of the humblest and poorest tizens of the community. Solo·on Robbish, an old man of sev·nty, a push cart peddler, put up his cart and spent ght days in fasting and prayer for the Mayor's ·covery. He put a white shawl over his head and restled with God in prayer. Mr. Robbish said, Mayor Gaynor is it what say to the policeman to ›n't be hitting the peddler, to don't be chasing him. didn't was locked up for peddling for it is now five ·onths." "How is it the Mayor?" is Grand Street's ›urly inquiry. A little girl in East Houston Street rote this letter to the Mayor: "I have saved a hole quarter, and if I would lose that quarter I ouldn't be sorry so much as I worry about you. Why? You're a good Mayor." These pathetic and oquent tributes of the poor must have been a ›urce of great comfort to the Mayor in the hours his affliction. They are evidences of the fact that e Mayor in his administration has had especial ıre for the submerged contingent, for the down·d-out class, for the poorest, the humblest and ost oppressed members of the community. To ıch there was a special blessing promised in olden mes:

Blessed is he that considereth the poor; the Lord will deliver him time of trouble. The Lord will preserve him, and keep him alive . The Lord will strengthen him upon a bed of languishing; ›u wilt make all his bed in his sickness. (Ps. 41 : 1-3.)

ıproved Their Talents

Fifty years ago a Connecticut farmer called his ›ur sons to him at Middletown and giving them 700 apiece as a start in life, he bade them go forth ıto the world and make a living for themselves. ugust 14, the four brothers gathered at Bridge·rt at a reunion, to celebrate the golden wedding the oldest one, Darius Miller, who is eighty-one ·ars of age. With his $700 he established a large ·y goods business in New Britain, Conn. Charles ·iller of Waterbury founded the Miller & Peck Company, in Waterbury, and the Randolph & Clowes, and is one of the richest men in that city. He is seventy-one years old. Nathan G. Miller, of New York City, turned his money over hundreds of times. He was the first president of the Iron Steamboat Company, was president of the Eagle Lock Company, and owned a large block of the Edison Electric Light Company stock. Frank Miller, the youngest of the brothers, owns large timber lands in the South, is president of the City National Bank of Bridgeport, president of a large lumber company in that city, and is rated among its richest men. These men had good blood to begin with, had splendid home training, had the confidence of their father, who had good sense enough to start them out in life on their own responsibility, and they had the sterling moral qualities coupled with indomitable industry which enabled them to achieve success in life. It is not one time in ten thousand that sons turn out so successfully as the Millers have done. In their material and moral undertakings they give an illustration of the one who received five talents and so improved them that they were doubled.

Then he that had received the five talents went and traded with the same, and made them other five talents. (Matt. 25 : 16.)

Real Royalty

The scant press notices recently published, telling of the death by drowning of First Lieutenant Edward Y. Miller, Twenty-ninth Infantry, military governor of Palawan, reveal one of the most dramatic stories in all the annals of the American army. Miller was born in Pennsylvania in 1873. When the Spanish War broke out he enlisted as a volunteer and was sent to Porto Rico. The next year he was appointed captain and sent to the Philippines. Before long he was sent to one of the southern provinces, inhabited by some of the most savage of the Filipinos, and was made military governor. With him went his brave young wife and a few Philippine scouts. He immediately set to work organizing a government, and began a rule of justice founded on the Golden Rule. The Palawans were a partially civilized and wholly simple-minded people, a constant prey to the raids of fierce pirates from Borneo and Jolo, who made periodical visits to plunder, terrorize and murder, leaving bloodshed and ruin in their path. Young Miller, then but twenty-five years of age, changed all this. He drilled his subjects, and taught them how to fight. Shortly after his arrival they were able to meet and completely rout their fierce enemies. Thus this man, so recently engaged in business in a large American city, became the leader and chief of 34,000 souls dependent upon him for their government and protection. With the loyal assistance of his wife, Governor Miller established schools in eighteen villages. He taught the natives how to use their natural resources, and encouraged trade with other islands. At the same time he was instrumental in driving out the slave trade. The Governor and his wife were idolized by their subjects. It is said that the love and respect in which they were held was unequaled in any other one of the islands. While Miller was devoting his life to this reform his regiment was mustered out of service. But the War Department realized the great work he had done, and he was given a commission as a first lieutenant in the regular army, and retained as military governor of Palawan. And now, after twelve years of untiring labor, he has been called to a higher field, leaving thousands to mourn his loss. Governor Miller's tragical death seems an untimely end to so beautiful and useful a life, and yet there is no end to such a life of love in this world or the next. The ruler and his wife wore no material crowns and yet God had placed upon their brows a crown of justice, love, and service—expression of the only real royalty. The young ruler, who had lived the life of Christ on the earth, by the accident only entered a little more swiftly the portals of everlasting love, and received the crown of righteousness from his Maker and Judge. Real royalty is described by the wise man:

Mercy and truth preserve the king; and his throne is upholden by mercy. (Prov. 20:28.)

A Dry Military Camp

By a telegram from Pine Camp it is learned that the most perfect order is preserved under the command of General Frederick Dent Grant. Not one drunken soldier has been seen during the entire encampment, nor is there any record of disorderly conduct. General Grant has taken a special precaution to warn the men and protect them against the polluting influence of the liquor traffic. Two hip-pocket venders of whisky were doing a thriving business near the edge of the camp for a few hours, when word of their activity reached headquarters and General Grant called upon Sheriff Bogart to arrest and lock up both of the men. General Grant gave out a statement of his experience with the workings of the army canteen law at the encampment. Among other things it says: "When I say I think the canteen is better left out of the army, I believe I am taking the correct view. Take this camp for an example. Many persons have the idea that because there is no way under the present law for a soldier to get liquor within camp limits, dives and low saloons about the outskirts of the camp must thrive. Such is not the case, as I have taken care to learn. The other night I made a round of all the outside grogshops, and I found that wherever there were customers they were generally civilians. Wherever I found a soldier he was almost always a militiaman, and not a regular. This may be partly due to the fact that payday had passed and most of the troops had spent all their money; but I do not think that is the whole reason. The fact that a good many of these places have gone out of business purely because they could not get customers enough shows that my inference is correct." General Grant, it will be remembered, rode at the head of a procession of 50,000 people in Chicago, wearing his military uniform, in a demonstration against the saloons, and has been one of the most potential advocates of temperance reform in the United States. He is of the opinion, shared by millions of others, that to soldiers and sailors as well as to private citizens,

Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging; and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise. (Prov. 20 : 1.)

Saluted Statue of Liberty

As the White Star liner Majestic passed the Statue of Liberty on the way to her dock in New York harbor the other day, a little eleven-year-old French boy saluted the Goddess of Liberty with the song "America." Even the children of France know what our Statue of Liberty is. They are taught what it stands for. The lad's name is Martin Augustus Dessaux, and he was coming to America and greeted his entrance to it with the national hymn. After singing "America" he sang the "Marseillaise" with less effort. His parents are left behind, but he goes to join an aunt living at Plainfield, N. J., and trusts that his father and mother will also come to this country. The boy was exceedingly popular in his own land, and as he came away two hundred of his schoolmates came to the ship to see him off. If all the immigrants could have the spirit of loyalty to liberty and country which the little French lad has, our perplexing problem of immigration would settle itself. The spirit of the boy in a strange land was far different from that manifested by the children of Israel in a foreign country, who when asked for a song replied:

How shall we sing the Lord's song in a strange land? (Ps. 137 : 4.)

J. W. W., Breckenridge, Mo. Where can I find in the Bible the proof that Christ was nailed on the cross? A minister said it did not tell of him being nailed on a cross.

You must have misunderstood him. See the proof in John 20: 25-27.

E. M., Brooklyn, N. Y. Please tell me who was the first foreign missionary sent from America to the heathen, and where can an account of his life be found?

Adoniram Judson and Samuel Newell sailed together on February 19, 1812, for India, and Gordon Hall, Samuel Nott and Luther Rice followed them on the 22d. They were the first American foreign missionaries. Accounts of their lives and works can be found in the Encyclopedia of Missions and many missionary histories, especially of India. Nearly all have had whole books devoted to their personal histories.

Josephine O., Dunlap, Kan. A minister made the statement in our church Sunday morning that the man who bore the cross, after Christ was unable to carry it, was a colored man. Please tell me where he gets his authority for the statement.

The man who bore the cross of Jesus when the Saviour was on the road to Calvary was, according to Matt. 27: 32, Simon of Cyrene (see also Mark 15: 21, Luke 23: 26). He was a Hellenistic Jew and his birthplace, Cyrene, was situated on the north coast of Africa. This does not necessarily imply that he was a negro.

M. K. P., Livonia, N. Y. How many years has "Mother's Day" been observed, and how did it originate?

Five years ago, Miss Anna Jarvis, of 2031 North Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, lost her beloved mother, and she has set aside one day in each year since then for special observance of her memory. This was such a comfort to her that she soon began a world-wide movement for the general celebration of an annual "Mothers' Day." In 1908, the second Monday in May was publicly so observed for the first time. On May 8, 1910, it was more widely celebrated, even Japan and other remote countries joining in the remembrance. A white carnation, emblem of purity, was worn by each celebrant, and special services were held in many churches.

I. W. D., Harmony Village, Va. When a Sunday School announces, every Sunday morning, the amount of the collection from each class and the class that contributes the largest amount, is it in harmony with the teaching of our Lord as in Matt. 6: 1-4?

In a certain sense, such comparisons being confined to the immediate members of the Sunday School, it is in the spiritual family or household, and not before the world for the sake of vain show. There can be no valid objection to rivalry in well-doing. Besides, it is not for the purpose of glorification, but rather to arouse emulation. Some one must take the lead in such work and stimulate others to action. When a definite and proper object is to be accomplished, we are justified in enlisting all the co-operation we can by every legitimate means.

H. M., Philadelphia. I have been greatly distressed about the following questions. Can you help me? May we be sure God answers prayer for spiritual blessings for ourselves and our loved ones? He says: "If we ask anything according to his will, he hears us, and we have the petition we desire." Yet, how can that and similar passages be true in view of the facts as we see them? We ask that we and those dear to us may be kept from falling under stress of temptation, and we see and hear every day of Christians who do fall in spite of the many prayers we offer for them. We plead God's promise, "He is able to keep you from falling," etc. It takes all the heart and life out of prayer to feel they may not be answered.

God's ways are not as our ways. We are at best but children in spiritual things. Yet there is nothing in this world so clear and so well-attested by Christian evidence, as that if we pray with believing hearts and in the right spirit, he will hear us and do what is best for us. No such prayer goes unanswered. The answer may not be as we expected, nevertheless it will be for the best and to the purpose. Says Professor Denney: "When we pray in Jesus' name there is nothing which we may not ask. Whatever limitations there may be, they are covered by the name of Jesus itself. We must not ask what is outside of that name, not included in its promise. We must not ask a life exempt from labor, from self-denial, from misunderstanding, from the Cross; how could we ask such things in His Name? But ignoring this self-evident restriction, Jesus expressly, emphatically and repeatedly removes every other limit. There is nothing which the name of Jesus puts into our hearts which we may not, with all assurance, put into our prayers." In his name, we can ask with assurance for pardon from God; we can ask to be strengthened in temptation and to be kept from falling, and restored when through human weakness we do fall, for we have the assurance that he will not let us be utterly cast down; we can ask for the sanctifying work of the Holy Spirit in our lives. We can ask that our material wants as well as our spiritual needs may be fully supplied. But, in asking, we must have the faith to lay hold, and when we pray with this faith we shall never pray amiss.

M. C. H., Greenwich, N. Y. What is the locust tree?

The locust tree is the carob tree. Its scientific name is ceratonia siliqua. It is called the locust tree because it is supposed to have formed the food of John the Baptist in the wilderness. It is also called "St. John's Bread." The pods are called locust beans.

R. P., Buttonwoods, R. I. At about what time did the Emperor Montezuma live in Mexico? Tell something of his life.

Montezuma was born about 1479. He was war chief of the Aztec Confederacy. He was the son of Axayacoti and succeeded his uncle in 1503. He carried his military expeditions as far south as Honduras. He allowed the Spanish conqueror Cortez to reach the capital without opposition and received him with gifts. The Spaniards feared an attack and seized him as a hostage. Montezuma was killed by his own people while they were attacking the Spaniards. This was in 1520. He was succeeded by his brother, Cuitlahuatzen.

Mrs. J. B., Chatfield, O. 1. If a person die, can his spirit come to another person, as in the case of Elijah, who appeared to Elisha (II. Kings 2: 9)? 2. Could a minister inspired by the Holy Ghost be called a prophet? 3. Is there any passage of Scripture to prove that it is wrong to have an automobile?

1. Certain spiritual appearances or apparitions are well attested, yet the instances are so rare and surrounded by so much mystery that the mind cannot grasp or explain them. It is not in our power to penetrate beyond the veil. 2. No. Every good and faithful pastor may be inspired for his spiritual work, but the office of a prophet is a distinctive one. There are none that can be so called at the present time. 3. No. It has been held by some rather imaginative commentators that the passage in Nahum 2: 4 foreshadowed the railway train or the automobile.

A. F. D., Scranton, Pa. 1. Please explain Mal. 3: 7-10. 2. Does Christ sit on the right hand of God in the form of a person? (Heb. 1: 3.)

1. It was a rebuke to Israel for non-fulfilment of its sacred pledges. The Levites had been driven away by destitution. The people and the priests together connived to "rob God" by inadequate and blemished offerings. 2. The better translation is found in the Revised Version: "The very image of his substance," one in whom the divine essence has found its perperfect expression. There is no suggestion of human form.

L. B. S., Canton, O. What was the first subject in the nature of manual training taught in our public schools?

Drawing was introduced first into the school course in Massachusetts because of its importance in manufacturing industries. In 18 some work in wood and iron was introduced a some results of instruction in this line we shown at the Centennial in 1876. Later t spread of manual training was rapid.

O. McL., Omaha, Neb. What is the meaning the letters J.U.D., after a name?

It stands for Juris Utriusque Doctor, Doctor of Laws both civil and canon.

F. M. H., Plant City, Fla. 1 and 2. Is it rig to go to a saloon to buy wine for comm nion services? If so, and if the saloon wants to give it without money or pric is it right or wise to accept it? 3. Is right to take his money in a collection any kind for church purposes?

1 and 2. No, to both questions. No one pr fessing Christianity should have any traf with the saloon. 3. Such gifts might be tak and applied very appropriately to the relief the poor, too many of whom can trace th poverty to the saloon.

ESTRADA RULES IN NICARAGUA

AFTER months of desperate fighting, with victory declaring first for one side and then for the other, the insurgent forces in Nicaragua have at last triumphed over their foes. Granada and the capital, Managua, have fallen, and General Estrada rules as President in place of Madriz, who fled from the city to save his life. The province of Leon, at this writing, is still held by the followers of Madriz, but the foreign consuls believe that the war which has so long torn central America and brought about serious international complications, is about over. The Leonese are rated as the fighting men of Nicaragua, but with the greater part of the country arrayed against them and with their leader gone they would but invite certain defeat to remain longer with the Madriz faction. Granada, however, wishes to avenge past wrongs on the part of the Leonese.

The collapse of the so-called regular government at Managua came with startling suddenness. So long had the struggle continued and so frequent had been the rumors of the defeat, first of the insurgents and then of Madriz, that people had begun to doubt whether they were getting accurate reports of the state of affairs, and wondered if this carnival of blood were to have an end. Events, however, followed one another quickly during the third and fourth weeks of August, resulting in a series of insurgent victories which ended the régime established by the dictator Zelaya, a type of the Latin-American tyrant which is now more often found in romance than in real life.

The principal city of Nicaragua on the Pacific Coast is Granada. It is a city of considerable wealth and culture, and its citizens have displayed a great interest in education and in the arts, and it was distinctly in advance of most Central American cities. It has always been opposed to the arbitrary methods of the last two presidents, and the government enforced its obnoxious measures by strong detachments of troops, who acted with all the arrogance of conquerors in a foreign city. Freedom of action and speech was suppressed with an iron hand, and taxes were collected at the point of the bayonet. Naturally, the people of Granada waited eagerly for an opportunity to aid Estrada, whom they regarded as the liberator of their country, and had long hoped for an advance of one of his armies in their direction.

On August 19 the government troops under General Rivas made a desperate attack on the Estradist forces under the command of General Mena and General Chamorro. These two intrepid leaders had, after a series of skirmishes, posted themselves in the suburbs of the city, where they were confronting the difficult military problem of how they could attack Rivas in the home of their friends. Rivas' assault on their position settled the question for them. The ground was contested stubbornly. At last Rivas was struck down by a bullet, and his disheartened troops broke before the rushes of the Government Palace at Managua

Estradists. Before sunset they were in full retreat, but they fell back through Granada, pillaging and committing outrages as they went. The pursuing insurgents were received with wild demonstrations of joy. Men by the hundred flocked to the standards, eager to enlist and sweep the last of the Madriz troops from their province. Citizens of wealth placed their entire fortunes at the disposal of the Estradist leaders to be used to further the cause which had set their city free. Fewer dramatic scenes have been witnessed in Latin America than when the smoke-begrimed insurgents marched through the narrow streets of the Spanish-built city of Granada.

General Toledo, who commanded the Madriz army along the Tipitapa River, was attacked by another force of Estradists on the 18th and his force being seized with a panic he was forced to retire to Managua, leaving the road open to the capital. The insurgents from different points converged on the city until their cannon were booming and their rifles cracking less than twenty miles away. The city was seething with excitement and Madriz at last decided to make his escape before the insurgents should surround the place completely. If it had been taken by assault the fate of Madriz might have been that of many poor Estradists who have been shot without trial. Madriz called in General José Dolores Estrada, a brother of General Estrada, the chief commander of the insurgents, and turned the government over to him. Then, taking with him his chief officials, Madriz hastily left the palace and reached the railroad leading to the coast. As the train pulled out a volley was fired at the cars, but no one was injured. The fleeing party reached Corinto, where Dr. Madriz's family had arrived the day before, and arrangements were immediately made to leave the country on a gunboat or on one of the Pacific mail steamships. They took refuge meanwhile on the steamer Victoria.

José Estrada, who had received the government, at once issued a proclamation stating that he would turn it over to his brother, and sent a committee to inform him of the change in presidents. Juan Estrada sent a cablegram to our State Department August 23, in which he said:

"The first official act of the new President of Nicaragua is to assure through Your Excellency the American people of the warm regard entertained for them by the victorious party of the revolution. I desire to inform Your Excellency that Nicaragua is willing and eager to make the proper restitution for the unfortunate killing of your citizens, Cannon and Groce, and for other atrocities committed by my predecessors. JUAN J. ESTRADA."

Our fleet has been held in readiness off the Nicaraguan coast to protect American interests, but it is hoped now that their active intervention will not be called for. Pittman, the young American engineer, has been set free and is at the American consulate. Our bluejackets had been held in readiness to be rushed to Managua when it was thought that it would be given over to mob rule, but the Estradists held the anti-American sentiment of the Madriz faction in check.

BIBLE EXCLUSION CONDEMNED

The Minority Opinion of the Illinois Supreme Court Defends Its Use in the Public Schools of that Sta

PUBLIC opinion has been greatly stirred over the recent decision of the Supreme Court of Illinois, ruling out the Bible from the public schools of that State. The opinion of the majority of the judges, which was delivered by Justice Dunn, has been widely discussed, but nothing whatever has been given to the public regarding the opinion of Justices Hand and Cartwright, who dissented from the majority opinion, and, in a very able and convincing document, presented their views on the subject.

In the majority opinion it was recited that certain taxpayers, of the Catholic faith, had objected to the reading of the Authorized Version, and other devotional exercises, as sectarian and therefore a violation of the Constitution. The majority ruling said:

> It is true that this is a Christian State. The great majority of its people adhere to the Christian religion. No doubt this is a Protestant State. The majority of its people adhere to one or another of the Protestant denominations. But the law knows no distinction between the Christian and the pagan, the Protestant and the Catholic. All are citizens. Their civil rights are precisely equal. The law cannot see religious differences, because the Constitution has definitely and completely excluded religion from the law's contemplation in considering men's rights. There can be no distinction based on religion. The State is not, and under our Constitution cannot be, a teacher of religion.

The minority opinion boldly defends the use of the Bible in the schools and declares that such use is not in any sense a violation of constitutional rights. The opinion proceeds:

The Constitutional Question

"The Federal Constitution does not control in the matter of public schools or in what instructions shall be given therein, but the regulation of public schools, as well as their support, rests with and devolves upon the several States. Nor does the Constitution of the United States provide for protecting the citizens of the respective States in their religious liberties. This is left to the State Constitutions and laws. Nor is there any inhibition imposed by the Constitution of the United States in this respect on the States. The question, therefore, to be decided in this case is, is the reading of the Bible in the public schools of this State prohibited by our State Constitution?

"The Bible is not mentioned in the Constitution, nor is there found therein any express inhibition against the giving of religious or moral instruction in the public schools, and while the Constitution is silent upon those subjects, it has been from the formation of our State government to the present time universally recognized by the people that there are certain fundamental principles of religion and morality which the safety of society requires should be imparted to the youth of the State, and that those principles may be properly taught in the public schools as a part of the secular knowledge which it is their province to instil into the youthful mind. That this may be done without the infraction of any of the safeguards of the Constitution is recognized in all the cases where the right to read the Bible in the public schools has been conceded, so far as we have been able to discover.

The Bible Not a Sectarian Book

"Even as early as the Ordinance of 1787 the men who framed that great charter of liberty sought to secure to the inhabitants of the Northwest Territory, and their posterity, the inestimable blessings of religious and moral instruction. It is therein provided that, 'religion, morality and knowledge being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall forever be encouraged.' And Mr. Justice Lyon, in State v. District School Board, 76 Wis. 177 (which is the main authority relied upon by the relators while considering this phase of the question and while referring to the Bible), said (p. 195): 'Furthermore, there is much in the Bible which cannot justly be characterized as sectarian.' There can be no valid objection to the use of such matter in the secular instruction of the pupils. Much of it has great historical and literary value, which may be thus utilized without violating the constitutional prohibition. It may also be used to inculcate good morals—that is, our duties to each other—which may and ought to be inculcated by the district schools. No more complete code of morals exists than is contained in the New Testament, which reaffirms and emphasizes the moral obligations laid down in the Ten Commandments. Concerning the fundamental principles of moral ethics, the religious sects do not disagree.'

Free Exercise of Religion Guaranteed

"It has always been understood that those general provisions in the State Constitutions which usually appear in what are designated as a 'bill of rights,' and which provide that the enjoyment of the free exercise of religious profession and worship, without discrimination, shall be forever guaranteed to the people, and that they shall not be required to attend upon or support any ministry or place of worship against their consent, were primarily designed to prevent the establishment of a State religion or the compulsion of the citizens to support, by taxation or otherwise, an established ministry or places of established worship, it being the object of such constitutional provisions to work a complete divorcement of the State and the Church, and to sever the relation between the State and Church which had existed in the mother country prior to the Revolution and secure to the citizen freedom of conscience in the matter of religious belief and worship, and that the instruction which was to be imparted in the public schools did not fall within those provisions of the State Constitution unless the instruction sought to be imparted degenerated into what may be properly designated as denominational or sectarian instruction and falls within the inhibition of those provisions of the Constitution which were enacted with a view to placing all religious denominations or religious sects upon an equality before the law.

No Good Ground for Bible Exclusion

"We think it obvious, therefore, that all must agree that there can be no rational constitutional basis upon which this court can hold that the Bible can be excluded from the public schools of the State other than upon the ground that it is sectarian in character, and falls within those inhibitions of the State Constitution which prohibit teaching in our public schools the beliefs and doctrines of the different denominations or sects into which the believers of the Bible have in the course of time divided.

"In all the cases upon this subject which the diligence of counsel have been able to discover—and, so far as we can learn, they have found them all—when the Bible has been excluded from or when it has been admitted to the public schools, the question turned upon (1) whether or not the Bible was viewed by the court then considering the question to be sectarian in its character or non-sectarian in its character; and (2) whether the engaging in the reading of the Bible, repeating the Lord's Prayer, singing songs, etc., rendered the public school in which the exercises were held a place of public worship. None of the courts of last resort have held that the Bible, as an entirety, could be excluded from the public schools on constitutional grounds, as none of them have held that all parts of it were sectarian. The Supreme Courts of two States, Wisconsin and Nebraska, have held that certain portions of the Bible are sectarian in character while others are not sectarian in character, and that the sectarian portions should be excluded from the public schools while the non-sectarian portions might be read. Neither of these courts, however, lays down any test or tests or points out any course of reasoning whereby the school boards, teachers, patrons or pupils of the public schools can certainly determine what portions of the Bible are sectarian and what portions are non-sectarian—that is, what portions may and what portions may not be read in the public schools.

"The Supreme Courts of Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Iowa, Kentucky, Kansas and Texas have each held the Bible to be non-sectarian in character in its entirety and that no part of it could be excluded from the public schools on constitutional grounds. The judgments of those courts would seem at least to be capable of enforcement and to announce a definite rule and one that would be readily understood by the school boards, teachers, patrons and pupils, and the reasons given in support of those judgments appear to be satisfactory, convincing and logical. The Supreme Court of every State of the Union which has spoken on the subject, with the exception of Wisconsin and Nebraska, has held that the reading of the Bible in the public schools is not prohibited by constitutional enactment, and the Supreme Courts of Wisconsin and Nebraska each hold that only portions of the Bible may be excluded.

An Open Challenge

The majority opinion does not cite a single case, and one cannot be found, which sustains the position assumed therein, but that opinion is in conflict with the adjudications of the Supreme Court of the United States and the Supreme Courts of Maine, Massachusetts, Ohio, Michigan, Iowa, Kentucky, Kansas, Texas, Wisconsin and Nebraska upon the questions here involved, and this conflict cannot be explained upon a difference of constitutional enactment, as no essential difference has been, and cannot be, pointed out upon this subject between the Constitution of this State and the Constitutions of the States referred to. The majority opinion is also out of harmony with all our previous decisions on the subject and either ignores these decisions or misinterprets them.

"We think it apparent that it must be held, from a constitutional standpoint, that all parts of the Bible can be read in the public schools or that it must be excluded as an entirety from the public schools, and the Supreme Court of Ohio has held that the Bible could not be admitted to the public schools of the State against the wish of the school board in control of the schools in the city where the question arose, but that its admission or exclusion from the public schools of that State rested entirely with the several school boards. . . .

"There is no book that is so widely read or so highly respected as the Bible, or that has had so great an influence upon the habits and lives of mankind, and all men whose judgments are of value—even those who deny its divine origin—admit it to be a great historical and literary storehouse and that its teachings are of the greatest value to the world. . . . We do not think the Bible can be said to be a sectarian book or that its teachings are sectarian. Its plan of salvation is broad enough to include all the world, and the fact that those who believe in the Bible do not agree as to the interpretation of its teachings and have divided into sects, and are therefore sectarian in their beliefs, do not change the Bible or make it a sectarian book. To make the Bible sectarian it must be made to appear that it teaches the dogmas of some particular sect, and it is not sufficient to show that it is sectarian, to establish that its teachings are so comprehensive that different phases of belief may be founded on arguments based upon some of its parts which, when perhaps only imperfectly examined and partially understood, may seem to tend to support the doctrines of a particular sect and to overthrow the doctrines of some other sect. . . .

The Whole Matter Clearly Set Forth

In summing up the whole question the minority opinion says: "The majority opinion seems to proceed upon the theory that the people cannot be trusted to determine, through the constitutionally elected school officers the question whether the Bible shall be read in the public schools of the State, for fear that where Protestants are in the majority the King James version will be read and where the Catholics are in the majority the Douay version will be read, and that by leaving the question to the determination of the school boards (where it has heretofore rested), 'a religious contest may be expected at each election of a school director.' The principle which lies at the basis of our government is that majorities must control in the determination of all questions which affect the public, and that principle applies here as it does in the decision of all public questions. The State of Illinois is a Christian State. Its people, as a people, are a Bible reading people, and its citizens who are students of and believers of the Bible are not all found in the churches. We are of the opinion the decision of the question whether the Bible shall be read in the public schools should be left where it has rested from the foundation of the State and through its history—i. e., with the local school boards—and this court, with a view to foreclose the people by its decision upon the question whether they desire to have the Bible read in the public schools, should not read into our State Constitution, as the majority opinion does, a provision excluding the Bible and all its translations from the public schools, and that especially should this be true in view of the well-known historical fact that the framers of the Constitution of 1870 expressly refused to incorporate into the Constitution a provision excluding the Bible from the public schools when that provision was offered in that Convention, and declared by its action in declining to incorporate into the Constitution such provision in the view of the members of that Convention, the question whether the Bible should be read in the public schools should rest with the several school boards of the State where it had rested under the Constitutions of 1818 and 1848.

"While it is true this court may construe the Constitution, it has not the power, and it should not, under a pretext to construe the Constitution amend it, and certainly not in a case like this, where the effect of the amendment will be to deprive many thousands of children living in the State, of any knowledge of the principles taught in the Bible, as the Bible is not taught in all the homes of the State, and the only knowledge which a large number of children in this State will ever gain of the Bible must be through the public schools, and if they do not get such knowledge there it will be lost to them entirely. We therefore most respectfully dissent from the majority opinion and earnestly protest against a result which excludes the Bible from the public schools of the State."

TALES THAT CHARM CHILDREN

Good Books for Children

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

(θME time ago a little American girl wrote a) letter to Mr. Rudyard Kipling telling him how much pleasure she had had in reading his c rming Jungle Books. The child, by the way, who h never read the Jungle Books has still a great pasure in store. Not only has their author woven vh consummate art a fascinating story in their cightful pages, but he has done much to make cldren love and understand animals, investing tm with almost human attributes. Those of us vo have not studied the ways of the dog and the c and the other domestic animals that are depend- e on our care may not think of them as indi- vuals, but lovers of the cat, the dog and the horse a aware that they have as many differences of cposition and varieties of character as we our- sves have. Mr. Kipling was able to show us the lable side, shall we say, of t wolf and the bear, so that found Gray Brother much re interesting than we had r thought him before. But t chief reason of alluding to t Jungle Books beyond say- i that they ought to be on ry juvenile book-shelf is to ntion Mr. Kipling's regard f a writer of English fiction ose works are entitled to a manent place in literature. r. Kipling wrote to his little erican correspondent and td her that she ought to nd the stories of Juliana ratia Ewing.

I suppose that in the great RISTIAN HERALD family re are numerous children o have read Jackanapes, Flat-iron for a Farthing, Story of a Short Life. ere must be many who ve not yet read these books any of the others that ne in bright succession m Mrs. Ewing's gifted pen. ey have lately been pub- hed with beautiful illustra- ns, eleven volumes in a x, by Little, Brown & Com- ny. Their purchase would a good investment in a usehold of growing chil- en, and as they might be cured one at a time the oks would come within the nge of incomes that demand se economy. To write good ries for children is a rare complishment. The charm Mrs. Ewing's work is that ler people become children der her magical spell. Mr. pling is not alone in his aise of her beautiful stories. thers so often want advice out the best books for their children that this is ven in answer to a sheaf of letters.

For the older girls there is at present no better oice among books than The Little Colonel Series, Annie Fellows Johnston. This, to the regret of ousands of girls, apparently came to an end a ile ago when Lloyd Sherman, the fascinating ttle Colonel, became a bride. To the delight of e same audience there is another book, its heroine e of the girls who visited in Lloyd Sherman's me, and whom we had previously met in Arizona. ary Ware is the name of the new book, and let it stated that it is a merry story of life at an excel- nt boarding school in Washington. It is equal to e best of its predecessors, and this is high praise. ne mantle of Louisa Alcott has fallen on Annie llows Johnston.

Since mothers are sure to inquire I will simply ld here that these books hail from Boston and bear e imprint of L. C. Page & Company.

A Hint for Guests

The guest has as much to do with making a visit successful and pleasant as the hostess who arranges the routine of the home for the entertainment of her friends. Every home has features peculiar to itself. The tactful guest soon discovers when to remain in her room, leaving the family to their own devices, and when to stay with them, adding to their enjoyment as well as herself receiving gratification. In the morning it is usually well for a guest not to be too early afoot. She should be ready for breakfast when called, but in most houses a certain amount of furbishing takes place in the early morning, and a guest who has a habit of rising too soon and appearing in regions where the housemaid is busy is distinctly inopportune.

A friend once told me that, being accustomed in her own home to extremely early rising, she was a little frightened when at eight in the morning she had not been summoned to breakfast. She quietly descended the stairs, and came to the door of a room which stood ajar, the living room of her host and hostess.

Peeping in, she saw her host standing alone by a long mirror, where the best light of the house was to be had, busy with razor and shaving soap. She hastily retreated, mortally afraid that he might have had a glimpse of her in the looking-glass.

Stay where you have a right to be when you are visiting in a home with which you are but slightly acquainted. This is a good rule for delegates, visiting secretaries and others who, so to speak, are quartered in unfamiliar households which open to them friendly doors.

A Musical Gipsy Family

THE most romantic people on the face of the globe are the gipsies. They are a wandering folk with no settled habitation. The nomadic instinct is strong in their blood, yet they are simple and kindly and do not deserve the suspicion with which they are so often regarded. The Spanish gipsies are a picturesque survival of the past, having advanced little farther than their ancestors and knowing nothing of the modern spirit.

Grandparents

GRANDPARENTS are the real aristocrats of the household. They have lived longer, seen more, accomplished more, sustained and suffered more than their children and grandchildren. This may sound trite, but the result of the longer living and the greater endurance has been to place them on the higher level of advancing years, a plane where burdens weigh less heavily and conditions are less cramping than lower down on life's hill. There may be those who are ready to dispute this assertion, forgetting that life at either end has intervals of ease unknown to those who are tramping along the dusty road of middle age. The little children have time to play. The grandparents have reached a place where they, too, may play if they choose. Of course, there are many varieties of disposition and temperament in these dear people whose heads are white. We have all heard of the little fellows who declared that they did not want to go to heaven if grandpapa would be there. Some grandfathers are morose and fault-finding, and some grandmothers are irritable and unreasonable. These, fortunately, are exceptional. The ideal grandmother is indulgent and overflowing with kindness, and her home, or her room, or her presence, is delightful to the little children and attractive to the boys and girls who bring to her their confidences. The ideal grandfather has no recollection of a period when his own sons fancied him severe. He has only toleration for the boys who are growing up to carry on a good old name.

One is always regretful when the changes and chances of life compel old people to resign their separate homes and dwell under the roof of a son or daughter. It would seem that, after a lifetime of toil and sacrifice, grandparents should keep their independence and let the children come to them, while they remain at their own fireside. Still, a home in which grandparents are loved and honored is often a home to be congratulated. The children trained there should be taught deference for their elders, should form the habit of respecting the easy chair by the window or the fireside, and the cosy corner nearest the lamp, which corner belongs of right to the oldest person in the house. The children should be encouraged by the grown-ups to perform little offices of love, to run on errands, and, in unobtrusive ways, they should be habituated to making happy the path of the aged.

I remember a household in which the oldest person was a great-aunt. She had brought up the mother of the family in the latter's orphaned childhood, and in her old age she found a calm harbor in the household of her niece. Her hair was like the driven snow; her eyes were keen and bright as those of a hawk until she had attained her ninetieth year, and her ready wit and effervescent fun were equal to the entertainment of her juniors, until one day she quietly fell asleep to waken on the shore of the river beyond whose waves there awaited her eternal youth.

Part of the training of all young people should be to understand old people and learn how to live with them, what to do for them, and how to recognize beneath the mask of time the spiritual kinship which years have no power to destroy.

Miss Mason's Adventure

By ANNE GUILBERT MAHON

"WHAT is the important business you wish to see me about, and which your mother couldn't tell me over the 'phone?" exclaimed Miss Mason eagerly, as she burst into the room where her friend sat propped up in bed.

"Sit down, won't you?" asked the sick girl, smiling at her friend's vehemence.

"Well," said Miss Mason, as she sank into a chair beside the bed. "I'm glad you can laugh. It's a sign you're not very ill. But how did you come to lay yourself up like this?"

"Only a bad cold," explained her friend, "but the doctor says I must positively stay in bed for two days at least, if I don't want to bring on another attack of laryngitis such as I had last fall."

"I'm sorry! But what is this wonderful favor you want to ask of me? I just flew all the way over here, I was so consumed with curiosity. Relieve my mind at once, Elizabeth, please."

Elizabeth laughed again and responded, watching her friend closely:

"I want you to go on a picnic."

"A picnic! Where? When? How? What? You know I abhor picnics."

"Now, please don't say no. It's so important—and you know you told mother you had no engagement for this afternoon."

"This afternoon? You want me to go on a picnic this afternoon? Elizabeth, you're sure your mind is——"

"Quite clear, my dear. Now listen, seriously. It's only to take a few little girls to Acorn Park this afternoon. I expected to take them myself until this morning and the doctor ordered me to stay in bed. I had the lunch packed and everything ready. They are the girls who belong to my class at the settlement house. It's such a treat to them. They never see the country at any other time and they talk of it for months afterwards. They have been looking forward to it for weeks, and I can't bear to disappoint them. You really don't know what it means to them, Isabel. I thought perhaps you would do this for me——"

"Couldn't. I'd do anything else for you, Elizabeth; but this—— Why, I wouldn't know what to say to them, or what to do——"

"Yes, you would. You would enjoy it when you got to know the girls, and they are not hard to get acquainted with, and when you realized the pleasure you were giving them."

"But they will expect you. They wouldn't want a stranger to take them."

"They will be just as happy with you, my dear. Mother will 'phone to the settlement house beforehand, so they will be prepared. Now, Isabel, if you won't go, it means that those girls will have a disappointment such as you cannot conceive of. We leave the city, you know, next week, and I simply cannot take them for a picnic again before we go—even if I should be well enough. You surely won't deny those poor little things this pleasure—and it does them so much good, too."

Miss Mason sat silent, her brows contracted, her lips pursed up in deep thought.

"You won't have to do a thing but just go with them. They are big enough to know how to behave, and they are very tractable, I assure you. Please, Isabel!"

"Well," sighed Miss Mason, slowly. "Since you put it that way—I suppose I will; but——"

"You'll enjoy it, I know you will," beamed her friend.

Isabel departed reluctantly to make her preparations.

At the hour named—two o'clock—she found herself on the way to the settlement house, her arms laden with the baskets of provisions which Elizabeth had prepared, and her heart filled with doubt and misgivings. What should she say to them? How should she act? She had never been inside a settlement house, had never even taught a class in her own Sunday School. Elizabeth Lloyd was used to settlement work, and it was easy for her, but for Isabel! How senseless she was to attempt it! But she had promised Elizabeth, and she did not want to disappoint the children, after her friend had put the case so strongly to her.

While she was deep in these thoughts, she was suddenly greeted by several little girls, their faces beaming with expectation, and glistening from a liberal use of soap and water, their hair strained back in neat, shiny pigtails, their calico dresses crackling with freshness. Elizabeth had often told her that they were a superior class of mission children—of German extraction—and always neat and clean, although very poor. They were still several blocks away from the settlement house, but the girls had been watching for her.

"Miss Lloyd's mother 'phoned to the settlement house that Miss Lloyd was sick and couldn't come," cried an intelligent-looking girl, whose flaxen braids were so short and so very tight that they bristled out, independently, over either ear.

"She said you would take us instead," cried another, hardly more than seven years old. Miss Mason thought as she looked at her, but whose face bore the expression of a woman of fifty.

They did not seem to be at all disappointed that Miss Lloyd had been unable to come, and they acted as if they were perfectly resigned to her friend's substitution. Isabel was relieved.

They gathered around her and took the baskets—two girls carrying one between them—laughing happily.

She need not have feared that she would not know what to say to them, Miss Mason thought, for they chattered like so many magpies. All the way to the car they vied with each other in telling her about themselves, the settlement house, their families—until she smiled at their volubility.

She felt as if she had always known them, and she entered involuntarily into their joy and anticipation, and admitted to herself that she was glad, after all, that she had acceded to Elizabeth's request.

"A man sprang past them and in the water"

Their joy on the car was pathetic to Isabel. They cried out with delight at the most trivial objects. They noticed the trees and the flowers, the cows grazing in the fields. Everything they passed was a source of delight to them. Miss Mason watched them smilingly. She never could remember all their names, she thought, but it was easy to distinguish them. It was a puzzle to her that the big, overgrown, stupid but good-natured girl they called "Fatty" should be a sister to the precociously bright, wiry little sprite nicknamed "Imp." The intelligent-looking girl with the flaxen pigtails was "Johanna." The little one with the old face was "Mamie," and the baby sister, whom she had brought with her, was "Augusta." Poor Augusta was enveloped from head to foot in a big, heavy, old-fashioned blanket shawl, which impeded her progress considerably, but did not appear to affect her radiant spirits in the least.

"She doesn't need that heavy shawl this warm day, does she?" asked Miss Mason of her sister.

"No, but some one stole her cotton dress off the line last night, and she didn't have any dress to wear, so she's got to wear it," explained Mamie, unconvincingly but resignedly.

Miss Mason smiled involuntarily, but the tears sprang to her eyes as she looked at the quaint little figure in the big shawl. But it did not trouble Augusta. Her baby face was flushed with excitement and happiness, and her bright brown eyes were fairly bolting out of her head as she gazed around her at the wonderful sights. She could talk very little, and that only in German, so Miss Mason could not talk to her, but she placed her in the seat beside her and gave her one of Elizabeth's ginger cookies, and Augusta looked as if there could be nothing more to be desired on earth.

How they laughed! How they chattered! In all the experience of her happy, care-free young life Isabel Mason had never seen such thorough enjoyment, such unalloyed happiness, such pleasure in little things. Elizabeth was right—she had never had any conception of what a picnic meant to those children.

At last they arrived at the park, and their joy was complete. They raced over the green grass. They ran down the hills. They chased the birds and the butterflies. They picked the smallest, most insignificant flowers and went into ecstasies over them.

Miss Mason sat under a big tree and watched them with mingled feelings—feelings of joy that they should be so happy, and feelings of sadness that such a little thing should mean so much to them, that they were so unused to pleasures that she had thought every child possessed. She saw the thin, white face of Mamie flush and glow with healthy color. She saw the effect on all the children of the free, health-giving country air.

The grotesque little figure in the big shawl ran about with the rest, stumbling and tripping often over the long ends of her voluminous mantle, but she picked herself up with apparent unconcern and ran on. Once Miss Mason saw her bend over and put her ear to the ground, then she heard the girls laugh.

"Augusta—she never heard a bird sing before! She thought it came up from the ground. She put her ear down to hear," they explained in the midst of their laughter.

"Never heard a bird sing!" The words rang in Miss Mason's ears. She did not know that any child, anywhere had never heard a bird sing. She had not realized that in the little courts and alleys where these children lived there were no birds, no trees, no grass anywhere near. How ignorant she had been! Like little Augusta, the city was a world of which she had known nothing.

To please them, she joined in the games. She forgot she was the dignified Miss Mason—a leader in the exclusive circle in which she moved. She entered into their simple games as heartily as Elizabeth would have done. She was a child once more. The joy of the children was contagious. She laughed with them. She forgot herself, for once in her life.

After a while the girls began to throw out transparent hints.

"I am so hungry!" exclaimed Mamie.

"When will it be supper time?" asked Imp.

Johanna, who was evidently trying to be excessively polite, rebuked them severely.

Miss Mason looked at her watch. It

THE ANTI-SUICIDE LEAGUE

By Mrs. E. M. Whittemore, Founder of the "Door of Hope"

THIS branch of the Salvation Army was organized in 1906. Shortly after the "Door of Hope" began to affiliate with the Army, I was led to take an interest in the Anti-Suicide work. After assisting Brigadier Mrs. Bovill, temporarily, I was commissioned to take full charge of the special department, and now most of my time is given to it. It is a unique effort to render assistance to those contemplating self-destruction.

A few weeks ago, I met one who was grateful for the marvelous way in which God had delivered her from suicide. Her face flushed with pleasure and her words expressed much joy, as she informed me that not only was all the desire taken from her, but her temporal affairs had been so wonderfully adjusted that she was now capable of caring for her old father, and she could take up the duties of life without fear or doubt. One day, six months before, she sat in my office in abject despair. She said she had been standing in the middle of the street, praying that a car or an automobile would run over her.

One evening, a young girl was spoken to in one of our religious services. She had a desperate look upon her face. After talking with her nearly an hour, she promised to come and see me the following day, which she did. She told me that in a moment of haste she had married, and the one to whom she was united proved anything but desirable. To drown her misery she resorted to the use of drugs. The next time she came, a look of malice and hatred was perceptible on her face, and, after some little conversation, she finally confessed to me that that very night she had planned not only to take her own life, but her husband's as well. God in a most marvelous way intervened. I now have the pistol and the morphine she planned to use and I keep them as trophies of God's faithfulness in delivering her at a most critical time in her life. She is now happily situated; her husband is converted, and only a few days ago she came to my office and told me, out of the fulness of her heart, of the goodness of God, and of her determination to serve him the rest of her life.

Another interesting case was that of a cripple. After desperately struggling to support herself and sending what little money she obtained to one whom she thought she could trust (it was to meet a certain indebtedness), she discovered to her sorrow that the money had been misspent and she was stranded completely and within a few days would be homeless. In great torture of mind the only way out seemed to be suicide. But she, too, with a little kindness extended and by the grace of God, was brought to see the wickedness of such a thought. In deep conviction, she called upon God for mercy and pardon. After a little effort, everything was adjusted, and it has been most encouraging to hear from her from time to time, and to witness the simple trust and gratitude of her faith in Him who so marvelously delivered her.

One morning, I received a letter written by a heart-broken woman. I hastened to see her, and was horrified at the tale of misery I listened to. She was well-educated and refined. She had a lovely home, until a year or so before, when her husband was stricken with paralysis. He lost his position and for months was a helpless invalid. All the money they had laid aside was expended. He became desperate, and one day managed to crawl out of the house, leaning on his crutches. He was helped by some one on to a car, rode down to Brooklyn Bridge, and managed with considerable effort to get upon it, and after a few moments a splash was heard in the water below. When apprised of her husband's absence from his room, the poor wife rushed frantically out into the street and until late at night she was wandering aimlessly in hopes of ascertaining his whereabouts. As a last resort, she applied at the police station. She was informed that a body, answering the description she gave, had been taken to the morgue, an hour or two before. Hastening there, she gazed upon the face of her husband, whom she recognized at once. On her way back home, she managed in several places to procure small quantities of morphine, and closing the doors of her room, she took an overdose. It was discovered just in time, but great suffering followed. She was taken to the hospital and her life was saved. Realizing the awfulness of the deed, though not a Christian herself, she desired that her little boy be brought up in a right way. For days she struggled to meet everyday needs, until one night, getting terribly discouraged, she resolved to take the life of her little one as well as her own and thus put both out of misery. This would have been carried out, but that evening something extraordinary occurred. A neighbor brought in a small parcel, wrapped in an old newspaper, and as it lay upon the table, her eye caught the headline of a column. She seized the paper and read the article under the title of "The Anti-Suicide League." She soon decided to write a letter to us for the sake of her little boy. In this case also God manifested his power, and though she has had many trials and sorrows, thoughts of self-destruction have been banished from her mind, and into her heart there has been born a great desire to follow in the footsteps of Jesus wheresoever he might lead her. A short time after her wonderful deliverance, her little boy was stricken down very suddenly, and passed away, but though her sorrow was great, no thought of her former determination to destroy her life was entertained. She has been now for some time past in a good home, looking after some helpless little ones.

Mrs. E. M. Whittemore

Possibly one other case might be referred to. It is that of a young woman who came to my office with her little child. After a time, she opened her heart, and with tears rolling down her face, in a most piteous way she asked if the little one could be provided for by the Army, or if they ever took children to bring up. When assured that they would take the child, she clasped her hands together and gazing upon the face of her little one, with all the mother love shining out of her sad eyes, she asked, "And will you promise to tell her when she is grown that my little darling need never blush when she hears her mother's name mentioned? I have never stooped to do a single wrong thing, even in all my extremity and suffering, that would cause my child a pang of regret, and when I leave her here to-day, I shall never look upon her face again." She sobbed bitterly as she said this. "We once had a very happy home," she explained, "until my husband passed away. The little money we had saved was soon used. I could not sew and, therefore, knew not just what to do; but by managing to pawn one thing and another, and going without food at times myself, I was able to provide for my darling." One could see starvation in her poor emaciated face. It told its own story, and was a marked contrast to the healthy appearance of the baby girl, whom she so truly loved. "For days," she continued, "I have been contemplating taking my life. I could see no other way out of my misery; but I was not willing so to do until some provision had been made for my little one. This morning, however, I was so weak that I felt that something must be done before the sun went down. And as I was coming out of the grocery store with some food for my baby, I saw a piece of paper. I picked it up, and on opening it, I saw the words, 'The Anti-Suicide League.' As I read it, every word burned into my heart. I decided that any organization that was so humane as to help a person in such dire need certainly could be trusted with the care of my baby, and now—and now," she sobbed, "will you take her? Will you take her?" It is hardly necessary to add that the child was cared for and the mother as well, and she has now a little home once more, with her child by her side. She is learning by degrees to care for her as well as for herself, and best of all, she has taken Christ into her heart and life.

Within the last few months, hundreds of intending suicides have called to receive advice and help. Out of this number I know of none who as yet have committed this awful deed. One must be very practical in dealing with such a class, and quite often they need to be assisted financially for a little while; but the results are of such a character that I can never regret anything expended in their behalf. The prayers of all good people are desired that special guidance may be granted to us in meeting the need of this most important class, so that effective work may be accomplished to the glory of God.

ON THE MOUNT OF BLESSING

WHEN I am alone with my Saviour, in the hush of the dying day,
On the mount I seem to join him, where he has gone out to pray;
And I tell him my grief and heartache, and the burdens I have borne,
Misjudged, neglected, slighted, until I am all forlorn.

I seem to see his features, all scarred but kingly sweet;
And I see his side all bleeding and the nail-prints in his feet;
And his hands are raised in blessing, as I kneel and cry "Forgive!
I am dying with sin and sorrow—but thou canst bid me live!"

And there alone with my Saviour in the awe of the dying day,
With my hand on his seamless raiment, he answers as I pray,
And he says, "There is strength forever in the boundless stores above.
My Father only waits thy prayer to crown thee with his love.

"And in his infinite mercy he will help thee to forgive.
He will spread his wings above thee. He will teach thee how to live."
And there on the Mount of Blessing, when the discords of daytime cease,
I lay my sin and my sorrow, and my Saviour gives me peace.

Aunt Hannah's Chickens

By Mary B. Wingate

AS I was busy putting the finishing touches to my parlor after the spring cleaning, I heard a brisk rap at the door, and to my hospitable "Come in" Aunt Hannah's cheerful face appeared. After talking about various matters she said with great animation:

"It's time to be plannin' what we can do for Mont-Lawn this year. I've been so took up thinkin' about other matters, I've forgot all about the children's summer outin', but now I'm goin' to work in earnest for 'em.

"To think, while I'm breathin' this sweet summer air and watchin' the trees and grass grow, and listenin' to the birds (and 'pears if they never sang so sweet before), them poor little mites don't see no birds, nor flowers, nor ever have no chance to play on the green grass.

"I did think I'd be contented if I could send two or three of 'em out to Mont-Lawn, but now——"

"Why, Aunt Hannah!" I said, "two or three would be beyond you. Times are hard with you. You can't afford to send more than one."

"That is true," said she, "and that makes their case so much the worse. There'll be more starvin', naked little children this year than ever before, an' now, as I was goin' to say, I'm hopin' to endow a cot for the season."

"But I don't see how!" I said. "We are having all we can do to get along and keep out of debt."

"Well, you see, the Lord knew I was jest longin' to do somethin' more for him, an' he put it into the heart of Mr. Davis, when he went to the city to live, to give me his old shop and his double winders and all the chicken wire he had, so I could go into the hen business if I wanted to. I can get the shop moved and fixed up and pay for it with savin'; have winders enough to make it real sunny an' 'nough left to put on the north side of my house and make a hot-bed besides.

"Now you know I allers have what people call good luck with my chickens, but I don't believe in luck. I get the best aigs I know of and take good care of the chickens when they come off, and they allers do well an' my hens lay aigs all winter. I'm goin' to give the Lord the firstlin's of my flock, the first three broods, ten, nine and 'leven chickens are his, an' while I can't sell 'em in season to use the money, I can contract 'em and get my pay down, for they know me in the city where I send 'em."

"But, Aunt Hannah, isn't that 'counting chickens before they are hatched'?"

"No, for they be hatched already, an' I've got a number of hens settin' now, so you see I'll have all I want to keep. With a plenty of wire fence, no varmint can't get in an' kill 'em. I've got some new kinds of aigs an' the chickens are cute enough. Come over an' see 'em. I jest sing for joy sometimes, I'm so happy, thinkin' how many hearts they'll make glad this summer. Then my cow has a bossy an' I've weaned him, an' I'm makin' the nicest kind o' butter, and butter's high, and I shall have a good deal to sell, so I'll get along all right."

"But, Aunt Hannah, what about our church expenses? I am troubled about them. Many say they can't do anything this year, and some of our men are out of work, for not all of them are farmers, you know."

"Yes, I do know, and I'm sorry for 'em. I've made up my mind to double my subscription anyway. The Bible says, 'He that soweth bountifully shall reap bountifully,' an' I've proved it over an' over agin. I ain't never afraid of comin' to want; but if I was, I'd try bringin' all the tithes into the storehouse an' prove the promises."

I knew it was of no use to reason with Aunt Hannah, so I forebore any further remarks. Aunt Hannah is really a fine-looking woman if she would only have up-to-date clothing, but she says she can't afford new clothes now, and that she expects to dress in white all the time by and by. I shouldn't wonder if she has jewels enough in her crown to make her a very beautiful angel. I know she does a great deal of good with her small means; and that is not the end of it, for her example makes the rest of us so ashamed of our penuriousness that in order to keep any degree of self-respect we have to give something too, even when we have decided not to do so. I must see if I, too, cannot do something for at least one of God's little ones.

Helping Homeless Boys

SOME remarkable results have been accomplished during the past twelve years by the Harlem Mission and New York Home for Homeless Boys, 150 West One Hundred and Twenty-seventh Street and 521 East One Hundred and Twentieth Street. One little fellow was brought in by a policeman. His face was so soiled that at first glance he was taken for a colored child. He proved, after a bath, to be a young Italian, who had not tasted food for three days and had no shelter for six weeks. He was arrested for stealing a bottle of milk and some rolls. He was kept in the Home three weeks and then restored to his mother.

Another waif who was cared for is now an ordained clergyman, graduated from the University of Tennessee.

Some time ago a boy was brought to the Home by a lady who said he had been deserted by his father. When preparing the boy for a bath it was found that he had been beaten so severely that his little body was a mass of bruises and the clothing had become embedded in them. He was cared for until better and a relative was found who promised to care for him permanently.

An orphan boy (the son of a deceased clergyman) was found wandering in the streets of New York, homeless. He was a consumptive and had been without food for thirty-six hours. A large tent was placed upon the roof of the Home, where the boy was cared for, and with fresh air and sunlight he soon grew strong. He said: "This is the first time I have been spoken to kindly since my father died."

The Home for Homeless Boys is thoroughly non-sectarian. Last year 510 boys were sheltered there, representing Catholics, Protestants, Hebrews and Greeks. The boys came from twenty-two States and twenty-six foreign countries. They were found at night in the bread lines, in hallways, and on park benches. The Home is a worthy one and deserves the widest support.

Why She Values The Christian Herald

Dear Editor: The premiums are very fine and I am much pleased with them. But were there no premiums I would consider it a duty and a privilege to introduce your excellent paper into as many homes as possible for the great good it is doing wherever introduced. I am so glad the good work Dr. Klopsch established still goes on with a thorough understanding of the spiritual uplift we all expect and receive who peruse its pages.

THE BOOK OF LOVE

COULD oceans, rivers, springs, and lakes
All that the name of water takes
Beneath the expanded skies,
Be turned to ink of blackest hue—
Add, too, the drops of morning dew
To make the wonder rise—

A book so large, could we suppose,
As thinnest paper would compose
As the whole earthly ball:
Were every shrub and every tree,
And every blade of grass we see,
A pen to write withal—

Were all who ever lived on earth
Since Nature first received her birth,
Most skilful scribes, to place
In clearest light that wondrous love
Found in the heart of God above
Towards Adam's sinful race—

Were each Methuselah in age,
And every moment wrote a page:
They'd all be tired and die:
The pens would every one wear out,
The book be fill'd within, without,
The ink be drained quite dry—

And then to write that love, oh! then,
Angels above, as well as men,
Archangels e'en would fail:
Yes, till eternity should end,
A whole eternity they'd spend,
Nor then have told the tale.

MOTHERS' DAY

MOTHERS' Day! Oh, welcome sight!
Over all our land
Fair carnations, pure and white,
Are seen on every hand.
Hearts grow tender for a while;
Loving memories are stirred
Of a mother's gentle smile,
Of her faithful eall and word.

O men with mothers living,
Remember them to-day,
And send a white carnation
To brighten up their way.
Those pure and lovely blossoms
Will hold a magic spell;
Oh, let them speak a message true
Your lips can never tell.

O men with angel mothers,
Some childless mother seek;
Give her a white carnation,
And do not deem it weak.
Let it lead her thoughts away
To our Father's house above;
Let her feel on Mothers' Day
All around are hearts of love.

Wear to-day carnations white;
Let them bring your childhood back.
See through memory's tender light
Blossoms all along your track;
Flowers a mother's hand has sown,
How they brightened all your way!
For the sake of days now flown
Wear carnations white to-day.

Pittsfield, Me. MRS. MARY B. WINGATE.

THE CALL OF THE SOUL

I STOOD by the bier of a loved one,
And in anguish made demand
Of the all-wise Heavenly Father,
That I might understand!
"Why do you take him from us,
With his life-work just begun,
And cause a world to suffer
The need of this noble one?

"Was it kind to give him to us
With all his noble worth,
And just as we learned his value,
To leave a barren dearth?"
Then came the whispered answer,
And I bowed my head in shame—
"Hush and reflect, thou mourner,
Ere for wisdom you call my name!

"Your query is all in selfishness,
You think not of his gain,
You're only aware of your sorrow,
Now, look beyond your pain."
And, with the Heavenly vision
I saw my beloved at rest,
With toil and care and heartaches
Changed for the mansions blest.

"You call him young in service,"
Whispered the voice again—
"But a full life is measured up to him,
So faithful has he been!"
And, with perfect understanding,
Given by the God of Love,
I praised him for taking our loved one
To the home of rest above.

RISING SUN STOVE POLISH

MIDSUMMER WORK AT THE BOWERY MISSION

By W. T. TWAMLEY, B.D.

THE many readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be glad to know that the Bowery Mission, during these hot summer months, is carrying on its most successful work as "the greatest Rescue Mission in the world." Hardly a day passes which does not bring some party of visitors from those far-off parts where THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is such a welcome guest, desiring to see and know for themselves about the work in which they have been stimulated to take such a lively interest. They are loud in their praises of the services, and especially are much arrested by the testimonies of the men, and are more than filled with admiration and gratitude for the magnificent and well-equipped buildings to be found in such a place as the Bowery, which are a lasting memorial to the late Dr. Louis Klopsch.

Many and many was the time Dr. Klopsch with much enthusiasm and delight personally conducted parties from all parts of the country through the new establishment at 227 Bowery, and it was one of his special delights to point out "The Brotherhood Room," where night after night the converts of the mission meet from 7 to 8 P.M. under the direction of their devoted leader, Brother Charles Balevre. Dr. Klopsch at nearly every meeting at which he was present would always call for the remarkable testimony of Charles Balevre; of a life thrown away for many long years, but at last reclaimed by the grace of God, and after giving his heart first to God, having everything which sin had stolen from him restored—wife and family, friends, position, character and the respect of all who know him.

During the three years in which the Brotherhood has been at work nearly eight thousand men have mustered o its roll; they are scattered far a wide and we are constantly hearin from many of them. The third ann versary of its establishment has ju been held, and it will long be remem bered as a memorable instance in i history. Stirring addresses were giv by the Rev. Charles E. Stowe, D.D son of the late Mrs. Harriet Beech Stowe; the Rev. Dr. A. H. C. Mor of Brooklyn and the Rev. Hen Craner, associate pastor of Bushwi Avenue Congregational Church, Broo lyn. Solos were rendered by Mr. Fra MacDonough, and a special luncheo was given by the First Presbyteria Church, South Orange, N. J., Re David DeForest Burrell, pastor.

Brother Virginius DeNyse, who h been a member of the Mission for t last seven years, has now followed o late president, Dr. Klopsch, to "t Great Beyond." One of the most im pressive and beautiful services ev held in the Bowery Mission was h funeral service, at the end of whi every one present filed by the bier a took a last look at the earthly remai of one who was a striking example the Brotherhood's work and one of t most signal instances of the triumj of God's grace. Mr. DeNyse had he great and independent commercial p sitions which through dissipation had thrown away; but after his co version he devoted his abilities a restored position without stint a with an exemplary self-sacrifice to t service of God and his fellow men.

During the month of July some the speakers at the evening meetin have been Rev. Dr. C. J. Allen, Re Minot C. Morgan, Bishop Darlingto Rev. Dr. Donald MacLeod, Hon. W Sulzer and General Horatio King.

"The Church of the Sea"

"THE Church of the Sea," an evangelical church for Christian seamen ashore and afloat, has been established in New York. It is in the new Seaman's Home and Institute of the American Seaman's Friend Society, No. 507 West Street, New York City. The first communion was observed May 1.

The chief object is to build up the religious life of seamen generally. Over three hundred thousand seamen annually come to the port of New York. The Seaman's Home and Institute endeavors to reach these wanderers through its philanthropic, social and spiritual work. The pastor-chaplain, Dr. E. M. Deems, was not satisfied that the m should be provided merely with bat games, athletic spor reading rooms and co certs, but he wanted t spiritual man refresh and that there should a church centre, so he o ganized "The Church the Sea."

Rev. Edward M. Deems

Edward M. Dee comes from three gene ations of ministers. H father, the Rev. Charl Force Deems, was t founder and pastor the famous "Church the Strangers" and of t American Institute Christian Philosophy New York City. A se vice will be held "The Church of the Se every night and regul preaching services Sundays.

Miss Mason's Adventure

r surprise it was nearly five o'clock, e hour Elizabeth had set for their pper.

They found a table under a big tree, the hill which sloped down to the etty little lake. The girls helped th alacrity. The table was soon read and the girls seated around it. iss Mason gazed in astonishment at e way the viands disappeared. She d not realized what the picnic sup- r meant to these girls who often nt hungry for the necessities of life. In an incredibly short time, it emed to her, they had finished their pper.

"Can we wash the dishes?" asked hanna.

"We'll be very careful," added amie.

Miss Mason gave her consent and e girls carried the piles of dirty shes down the hill to the lake, where ey stood on the boat landing, out er the water, and washed them. hat a good time they had! Miss ason could hear them talking and ughing together as they washed and ied the dishes. She turned back to e table to clear away the remnants.

"Stop that! Behave yourselves!" e heard Johanna cry.

There was a great screaming and shing and jumping to and fro among e girls on the landing. Some of em were splashing water in each her's faces, laughing and screaming glee. In vain did Johanna remon- ate.

"Girls! Girls!" cried Miss Mason, rningly. "You will get wet. Stop it."

Some of them stopped at once; but p had become thoroughly demoral- d. She jumped around, dashing ter in the girls' faces and over their esses. She jumped against a pile of shes, upsetting them with a loud tter.

"I'll tell ma," threatened Fatty, r face very red, as she advanced vard her younger sister. "Ain't u ashamed?"

"You'll never go on another picnic," id Johanna, with finality.

But Imp had broken loose at last, d there was no restraining her.

Miss Mason assumed her most dig- ied manner and hurried down to the nding, but she was only half way ere when there was a scuffle, a eam, a tremendous splash, and a ld cry of "Help!" Fatty was floun- ring around helplessly in the water, inly trying to clutch the edge of the nding, then she sank.

"You've drowned your sister, Imp kelstein!" Johanna cried fiercely.

Imp stood still at last.

The girls stood white and trembling. gusta lifted up her voice and wept th a mighty sound. Miss Mason flew t the landing.

"Imp pushed her in," explained the ls, breathlessly.
